Belphegor (bel'fe-gor, or Belfagor (bel'fa-gor). 1. [Said to be Arabic sa'ad, happiness.] An archdemon who undertook an earthly marriage, but who died, daunted, from the horrors of female companionship. See the extract.

Pluto summoned an infernal council to consult on the best mode of ascertaining the truthor falsehood of such statements (that wives brought their husbands to hell). After some deliberation it was determined that one of the number should be sent into the world endowed with a human form, and subjected to earthly passions, that he should be ordered to choose a wife as soon as possible, and after remaining above ground for ten years, should report to his infernal master the benefits and burdens of matrimony. Though this plan was unanimously approved, none of the fiends were disposed voluntarily to undertake the commission, but the lot at length fell on the archdemon Belfegor. . . . This story, with merely a difference of names, was originally told in an old Latin MS., which is now lost but which, till the period of the civil wars in France, remained in the library of Saint Martin de Tours. But whether Bracyer or Machiavel first exhibited the tale in an Italian garb has been a matter of dispute among the critics of their country. It was printed by Brevio during his life, and under his own name, in 1545; and with the name of Machiavel in 1549, and was about eighteen years after that historian's death. Both writers probably borrowed the [illegible] but they [illegible] scarcely have escaped [illegible]

Irving, Tales, p. 136.

[La Fontaine treated the subject in metre in his "Contes" and Wilson printed an English translation of it under that of Belphegor, or the Marriage of the Devil. [illegible] reprinted brought out a [illegible] entitled "Belphegor," 1691.]

2. A translation and adaptation of "[illegible]," a French play by Dennery and Marc Fournier, by Charles Webb (1856).

Belphegor is a mountebank, and though he earns his living by the most hideous shams, his distress and despair at the apparent desertion of his wife are very pathetic.

Belphœbe (bel-fē'bē). [F. bel, belle, fair, and L. Phœbe, Gr. Φοίβη, Artemis (Diana).] A huntress, in Spenser's "Faerie Queene," intended to represent Queen Elizabeth as a woman, as Gloriana represented her as a queen.

Beni-Hassan (bā'nē-hās'sän). A village in Middle Egypt, situated on the east bank of the Nile, opposite the ancient Hermopolis, in lat. 27° 54′ N. It is famous for its rock-tombs, and for its great rock-cut speos, or cave-temple. The chief groups of rock-cut sepulchers occupy a terrace in the limestone cliff bordering at a little distance the east bank of the Nile. The tombs date from the beginning of the 12th dynasty (2000–2500 B.C.), and consist of a rock-cut vestibule preceding a chamber in which is sunk a shaft at the bottom of which lies the tomb itself. The walls of the chambers are covered with the remarkable paintings of scenes of ancient life, but the tombs are especially notable for the celebrated so-called proto-Doric columns of many of these sepulchres. These are not usually two cavetto, in the rectangular rock openings, and support an architrave on their thin square abacus: there is no echinus. Some of the rock-cut shafts are grouped in pentagon forms; others have shallow channels with sharp arrises.

Benjamin (ben'ja-min). [Heb., commonly interpreted to mean 'son of the right hand,' i. e. 'fortunate,' but other explanations are given.] The youngest son of Jacob. He was named Benoni (sorrow-child) by his mother, Rachel, who died in giving him birth, but this was changed to Benjamin by Jacob. The tribe of Benjamin occupied a territory about 30 miles long and 12 wide between Ephraim on the north and Judah containing Jerusalem and Jericho.

The existence of the tribe of Benjamin was also very peculiar. Its territory was small and almost entirely occupied by the Canaanites rather than by the Gibeonites or enemies like the Jebusites. The Benjamites were like the else than a special military caste of a high caste as regards the use of the sling, their young men being accustomed to use the left hand instead of the right. Their strong place was Gibeah, to the south of Jerusalem. They were not liked, and their morality was said to be very low. Bouvier, Institutes of the People of Israel, I. 289.

The scene of action is in Danish and Swedish territory. The foundation is mythical, legendary, and historical material from the time of the Danish conquest of England to the middle of the first part of the 6th century. Danish poems embodying the material are supposed to have come to the neighboring Angles left behind in their old home, and to have then been brought over to England in the last migrations from the Continent. The poem was doubtless a gradual growth, and has probably existed in many successive versions. The form that has come down to us dates from near the beginning of the 8th century. It is preserved in a single MS. of the Cottonian Library in the British Museum. "Beowulf" is not only the oldest epic in English, but in the whole Germanic group of languages.

Berbers (ber'bėrz). A race of people (and also the name of a class of languages) constituting, with the Cushites, the Hamitic family, which is found scattered over North Africa and the Saharan from the Red Sea to the Atlantic. The complexion of the Berbers varies from white to dark brown; their features present those of the Egyptian type, their stature is medium. They have occupied their present habitat since the dawn of history. Never have their independent tribes become entirely subject to a foreign master, or lost their ethnic and linguistic characteristics, in spite of Punic, Roman, Arabic and Osmanli conquests. In the Kabail Mountains they are agricultural; in the Sahara nomadic. Linguistic studies have been the middle ages between the Mediterranean coast and the Negro-dialects of Sudan. Berber, a word of Aryan derivation, signifies "nation," and so does "Kabyle" or "Kabail," the name given them by the Arabs. They call themselves "Amazigh," which is "the Free," owing to the barren nature of the soil the Berber population, as compared with the area it covers, is disproportionately small. In language they are divided into Mohammedan, a few tribes have adopted the Arabic and so have a few Arabs adopted Berber dialects. The Berber languages are also called Libyan, the chief members nine principal languages: old Libyan, Kabail, Tamashek, Ghat, Ghadamsi, Shilha, Zenaga, Guanch, Siwah. See Hamitic.

4. A sister of Cleopatra, slain by the Romans 55 B.C.—5. A niece of Herod the Great, and wife of Aristobulus, and afterward of Theudion.—6. Daughter of Agrippa I., king of Judah 37–44 A. D. She was first married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis in Lebanon, and after his death lived with her brother Agrippa II., it is alleged in criminal relations. To improve this connection she married Ptolemy, king of Cilicia, but abandoned him soon and returned to her brother. Josephus tells us that she endeavored to stop the cruelties of Florus, the last and worst of Roman governors in Judea ("Jewish Wars," II. 15, 1). In the last struggle of her country's life, like her brother, was on the side of Rome. She played some part in Roman politics, supporting the election of Vespasian as emperor. For some time Titus was attracted by her beauty and grace, and it was believed that he would marry her. She followed the conqueror of her country to Rome, but Titus was compelled to repudiate her. In the New Testament she is mentioned as consorting with her brother in Herod Festus at Cæsarea, and as being present at the audience which Paul had with this governor (Acts xxv. 13, 23; xxvi. 30).

He was one of the leaders of the peasants in 1525, and subsequently served under the emperor Charles V. against the sultan Soliman and against Francis I. of France. The literary revolution of the 18th century from the artificial to the simple style was preluded by Goethe's "Götz von Berlichingen," a drama which he constructed from the autobiography of the original robber knight who represented himself in all honest but much misunderstood person. See Götz von Berlichingen.

Berlin (bėr-lin' or bėr'lin; G. pron. ber-lēn'). The capital of the German Empire and of Prussia, situated in the province of Brandenburg, on the Spree, in lat. 52° 30′ N., long. 13° 24′ E. It is the largest city in the German Empire, and has an important commerce and extensive manufactures of metals, machinery, cotton and woolen goods, confections, musical instruments, beer, etc. It was founded by the 13th century, and was greatly improved by the Great Elector, Frederick I., by Frederick the Great, and by later rulers. It was taken by the Allies in 1760, and by Napoleon in 1806. The following are among its objects of interest: Arsenal, now a Military Museum and Hall of Fame, so called. In plan it is a rectangle 296 feet square, with a large central court. It was finished in 1706, and the exterior is a good example of the architecture and decorative sculpture of the time. The mural paintings of historical and military subjects by Gieselschap in the interior are the finest work of the kind in Berlin. There is also a collection of portrait and mythological sculpture, in addition to the impressive exhibition of arms and battle-trophies. Brandenburg Gate, at the west end of Unter den Linden, a monumental gateway begun in 1789. It presents on each face 6 lofty Doric columns and a Roman entablature, surmounted by an antique upon which is a bronze quadriga of Victory. There are passages for vehicles, the central one of which is the widest. The gate is flanked by two Doric colonnaded structures in the form of temples, Column of Peace, in the Belle Alliance Platz, erected in 1840 in honor of the peace of 1815. The shaft is of granite on a high basement, and the capital of marble, surmounted by a figure of Victory. The total height is 90 feet. The monument is flanked by marble groups of Prussia, England, the Netherlands, and Hanover, the powers which triumphed at Waterloo. Monument of Victory, dedicated in 1873 in honor of the German triumphs of 1864, 1866, and 1870. It consists of a monumental column of yellow sandstone, supporting a colossal statue of Germania, the total height being 200 feet. The capital of the column is formed of eagles, and the fluted shaft is adorned with captured cannon. The pedestal bears bronze reliefs of the Danish war, Koniggratz, Sedan, and the triumphant return of the troops. The base of the monument is surrounded by a colonnade with allegorical mosaics of the overthrow of France and the restoration of the German Empire. National Gallery, of sculpture and painting, an effective building finished in 1859, in the form of a pseudo-peripteral corinthian temple with a cella 100 feet, and a total projection of the northern and an eastern portico surmounted by a pediment filled with sculpture on the façade, which faces the southeast. The pediments are 75 feet, and the columns are about 60 feet high. Access to the front portico is afforded by an impressive double flight of steps. The interior contains two exhibition floors, and is richly decorated. Old Museum, a building of the time of Frederick the Great, in the form of a Greek Ionic peripteral temple with pedimented towers, turned ends. The entablature bears eagles as acroteria, and the cella is lighted by 20 windows corresponding to the rear portals; at the corners are pavilions and colossal groups in bronze. In front opens the Lustgarten, with the Neptune Fountain, and beyond Pegasus attended by the Hours. The piers of the great central flight of steps bear bronze groups of equestrian combats with lions. In the vestibule stand statues of Schinkel and Rauch. In the wide-spread vestibule-hall are allegorical frescos of the Formation of the World from Chaos and the Development of Human Culture. Schloss or Royal Palace, the present residence of the sovereign, with a fine portion at one end, and inclosing two inner courts. It has four stories, together 100 feet high, and the dome over the middle is 200 feet high. The principal façade, which overlooks part of the Spree, was begun by Schlueter, and restored by the elector Frederick II. in 1451. About a century later a fine German Renaissance wing was added to the south, and in the reign of the first King of Prussia, Frederick I. brought the palace substantially to its present extent. Inside the chapel was built in the present century. The White Saloon (Weisser Saal) is the largest Egyptian room (30 × 78 ft.). See Unter den Linden.

Berosus (be-rō'sus). Lived in the first part of the 3d century B. C. A Babylonian priest and historian, author of a history of Babylonia and Greek fragments of which have been preserved by later writers. He was a priest of the temple of Bel at Babylon, and is said by Eusebius and Tatian to have been a contemporary of Alexander the Great, and to have lived until the reign of Antiochus Soter. He had, therefore, special opportunities of knowing the history and astronomy of his country upon which he wrote in Greek. Recent discoveries have abundantly established the first trustworthiness of this Manetho of Babylonia, whose works, unfortunately, are known to us only through quotations at second and third hand. Since a cylinder of Antiochus Soter and a contract tablet of his reign dated in Babylonian cuneiform, while bilingual fragments in cuneiform and cursive Greek of the celebrated astronomy have also been discovered, and a contract tablet in Babylonian cuneiform, dated in the fifth year of the Parthian king Pakoros, the contemporary of Domitian, exists in the museum of Zurich, there is no reason why Berosus should not have been equally well acquainted with both the Greek language and the old literature of his native country. And in spite of the fragmentary and corrupt state in which his fragments have come down to us, we now know that he was no. His account of the Deluge, for instance, agrees even in its details with that of the cuneiform tablets. Sayce, Ancy. Empires, p. 100.

Betterton (bet'er-ton), Thomas. Born in Tothill street, Westminster, 1635 (?): died in Russell street, Covent Garden, April 28, 1710. An English actor and dramatist, son of an under-cook of Charles I. He was apprenticed to a bookseller. Little is known of his early life. It is supposed that he began to act in 1659 or 1660. He joined Davenant's company at the Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre in 1661. Pepys at the beginning of his career and Pope at the end spoke of him as the best actor they had ever seen. He was great in both Dryden and with the most intellectual men of his time.

Of Betterton's eight plays, I find one tragedy borrowed from Webster; and of his comedies, one was taken from Massinger, a second based on Moliere's Georges Dandin, a third on Fletcher, a fourth partly on Jonson, and the fifth, Henry the Fourth, was an of those undaunted outrages on Shakespeare, of which the enormity in which it appeared was possible his age. Betterton's own tragedy of Henry the Fourth is a play, in which he is said himself to have well-nigh played, and his Prophetess was a conversation of Dryden and Fletcher's Prophetess into an opera, by Dryden himself and Henry Purcell, who published the music in score in 1691.

Bhagavadgita (bha'ga-vad-gē'tā). In Sanskrit literature, 'the song of Bhagavat,' that is, the mystical doctrines sung by 'the adorable one,' a name of Krishna when identified with the Supreme Being. The author is unknown. He is supposed to have lived in India in the 1st or 2d century of our era. His poem was at an early date dignified by a place in the Mahabharata, but is of a much later date than the body of that epic. Its philosophy is eclectic, combining elements of the sankhya, Yoga, and Vedanta systems with the later theory of Bhakti, or 'faith.' The whole composition is skilfully thrown into the form of a dramatic poem or dialogue, characterized by great loftiness of thought and beauty of expression. The speakers are the two most important personages of the Mahabharata, Arjuna and Krishna. In the great war Krishna refused to take up arms on either side, but consented to act as Arjuna's charioteer and to aid him with counsel. At the commencement of the Bhagavadgita the two armies are in battle array, when Arjuna is struck with compunction at the idea of fighting his way to a kingdom through the blood of his kindred. Krishna's reply is made the occasion of the poem, which in fact constitutes the Bhagavadgita, the main design of which is to exalt the duties of caste above all other obligations, including the ties of friendship and affection, but at the same time to show that the practice of those duties is compatible with the self-mortification of the Yoga philosophy as well as with the deepest devotion to the Supreme Being, with whom Krishna claims to be identified.

Bhagavatapurana (bhā'gā-va-tä-pō-rä'nä). 'The purana of Bhagavata' or Vishnu, a work of great celebrity in India, exercising a more powerful influence upon the opinions of the people than any of the other puranas. It consists of 18,000 stanzas, and is ascribed to Vopadeva, the grammarian Vopadeva, of about the 13th century A.D. Its most popular part, the tenth book, which narrates the history of Krishna, has been translated into many of the vernaculars of India.

Bharata (bha'ra-ta). In Hindu mythology and legend, a king of India and a hero from whom the people called Bharatas, often mentioned in the Rigveda, are represented as descended. (b) Son of Dasharatha by Kaikeyi, and half-brother of Ramachandra. His mother brought about the exile of Rama, but Bharata refused to supplant him. On his father's death, Bharata went to bring Rama back to Ayodhya and place him on the throne. Rama refused to return until the end of his exile, and Bharata declined to reign, but at last consented to rule in his name. (c) A prince of the Puru branch of the Lunar race, son of Dushyanta and Shakuntala. Through their descent from Bharata the Kauravas and Pandavas, but especially the Pandavas, were called Bharatas, 'descendants of Bharata.'

Bharatichandra (bhär'tri-ha'ri). In Sanskrit literature, a brother of King Vikramaditya, to whom are ascribed three Shataka-, or 'centuries of verse': (a) The Srinarashataka, or 'Century of Verse on Love'; (b) Nitishataka, 'Century on Politics and Ethics'; (c) Vairagyashataka, 'Century on Austerity'; a grammatical work, the Vakyapadiya; and by some the Bhattikavya.

Bianchi (bē-än'kē), The. [It., 'the Whites.'] A political faction which arose in Tuscany about 1300. The Guelph family of the Cancellieri at Pistoia having banished the Ghibelline family of the Panciatichi, a feud arose between two distantly related branches of the former, distinguished by the names of Bianchi and Neri, which, 1296-1300, became so violent that Florence, in order to pacify Pistoia, engaged that city to banish the whole family of the Cancellieri, but at the same time opened its own gates to them. In Florence the Neri allied themselves with Corso Donati and the violent Guelphs, and the Bianchi with Veri de Cerchi and the moderate Guelphs. and subsequently with the Ghibellines and the Panciatichi. Boniface VIII. espoused the party of the Neri and sent, nominally to bring about a reconciliation, Charles de Valois to Florence in 1301, with the result that the Bianchi, among whom was Dante, were exiled.

Bible of Forty-two Lines, The. An edition of the Vulgate, printed between 1450 and 1455 by Gutenberg and his companions. The book proper consists of 324 pages, 2 columns to the page, and, for the most part, with 42 lines to the column.

Bible of the Poor, or Biblia Pauperum. See the extract.

It is probable that the illustrations were made first, and that, in the beginning, the Bible of the Poor was a book of pictures only. Some German antiquarians say that the book in its original form, was designed and explained by a monk named Wernher, who was living in 1180, and was famous during his lifetime both as a preacher and a poet. Other German authorities put the origin of the first manuscript as far back as the ninth century, attributing the work to Saint Augustine, first bishop of Hamburg. It seems to have been a popular manuscript, for copies written before the fifteenth century have been found in many old monasteries. These copies are not alike. Nearly every transcriber has made more or less alterations and innovations of his own, but the general plan of the book—the contrasting of apostles with prophets, and of the patriarchs of the Old Testament with the saints of the Christian church—has been preserved in all the copies.

Blanketeers (blang-ke-tērz'). The name given to a body of half-starved Manchester operatives who met at St. Peter's Field, March 10, 1817. Each man was provided with provisions and a blanket, and their purpose was to walk to London to petition for some legislative remedy against capitalistic oppression, and especially for the great panacea of parliamentary reform.

The project of these poor simple-minded men, instead of exciting compassion, filled the minds of the government and the upper classes with alarm. It was regarded as an attempt to overthrow the constituted authority. The Habeas Corpus Act being, at that time, suspended, the leaders of the proposed expedition were seized and imprisoned. The greater part of those who had intended to join it yielded at once; a few, however, persisted in their intentions, but these had been placed along the proposed line of march, and they were intercepted, searched, and either sent back or imprisoned. Nothing was found on them to justify these proceedings, except "two unusually long knives."

Boileau-Despréaux (bwä-lō'dā-prā-ō'), Nicholas. Born at Paris, Nov. 1, 1636: died at Paris, March 13, 1711. A famous French critic and poet. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Dec., 1656. His first satire dates from 1660 or 1661, and was the forerunner of a series of seven, written between 1660 and 1665. To this same period belong his "Dissertation sur Joconde," and his "Dialogue des héros de roman." His satires were published without his sanction by a Dutch bookseller, who issued the book under the title "Recueil contenant plusieurs discours libres et moraux, en vers" (1666). Boileau issued his own corrected version in 1666, and within the next two years there appeared some twenty editions, both authorized and unauthorized. These models of elegant writing served as the foundation of literary criticism in France. Boileau was attacked from many quarters, and framed his reply in two satires, published in 1669. Little is known of his life between 1660 and 1677. During that interval, however, he wrote his second and third "Epitres," translated the "Traitise on the Sublime" of Longinus, published fragments of the "Lutrin" in 1673, and finally gave out his fourth and fifth "Epîtres"; the first four books of the "Lutrin," and "L'Art poétique," in the next edition of the "Œuvres diverses" of 1683. This publication raised Boileau to the first rank among French writers. In 1677 he received a pension of 2000 livres, and was named with Racine historiographer to the king.

In the same year he composed his seventh, eighth, and ninth "Epîtres." In 1684, despite his enemies' opposition, Boileau received the French Academy to the expressed desire of the king. In 1693 he published his "Réflexi ns critiques sur Longin," in answer to Perrault's "Parallèle des anciens et des modernes." His last [illegible] of Boileau's works are dated 1695, 1674, 1694, 1701, and 1713. The last edition revised throughout by Boileau himself, that of 1701, is generally taken as the standard. In addition to the works above mentioned, it contains the tenth and eleventh satires, and the last three "Epîtres." A twelfth satire was published after Boileau's death in the edition of 1713. To Boileau's works, and more especially to the "Art poétique," are due the theories on which the classical literature of France is based.

Book of the Dead, The. See the extract.

The chief monument of the religious literature of Egypt is the "Book of the Dead," in 166 chapters, now being critically edited by M. Naville. Portions of it were published on the mummy-cases and tombs, and are met with in the latest of the demotic papyri. It was, in fact, the funeral ritual of the Egyptians, describing in mystical language the adventures of the soul after death, and the texts it must quote in order to escape the torments and trials of the lower world. It is the literary reflection of the Osiris myth, and even along with the latter. A hieratic text of the fourth dynasty gives two varying versions of the sixty-fourth chapter, ascribed to King Menkaura, from which we may infer the antiquity of the latter. But only the essence of the work went back to the old Empire. The rest consisted of additions and glosses, and glosses of glosses which continued to be made up to the time of the Ptolemies. Each of these periods may have been of a practically moral character, contrasting strikingly with the mystical tone of the later accretions, where the doctrine of justification by faith is set in the place of that of good works. Stone, Anc. Empires, p. 79.

Book of the Duchess. A poem by Chaucer, known also as "The Death of Blanche the Duchess." It was probably written near the end of 1369, as Blanche the wife of the Duke of Lancaster, died Sept. 12, 1369. The poem is in octosyllabic couplets, and is a lament for the grief of the duke, and embodies the story of Ceyxand Alcyone. The duke, John of Gaunt, however married again in 1371, and the "goodliest lady" in his eyes was Katherine Swinford. Machault's "Jehan Lion" and "Dit de la Fontaine Amoureuse."

Book of Martyrs, The. A history of the persecution of Reformers in England, by John Foxe. It was published in 1559, and was in Latin. It was published March 20, 1563, and called "Acts and Monuments," but was popularly known as "The Book of Martyrs." He translated it into English himself.

Book of Mormon. The sacred book of the Mormons or Latter-day Saints: a corrupt version of a religious romance "The Manuscript Found," written in 1809 by Solomon Spaulding, and published in 1839 by Joseph Smith who pretended that he had translated it from the "Plates of Nephi." Hepworth Dixon, New America.

Book of St. Albans. A famed treatise on hawking, hunting, etc., printed in English in 1486. It was reprinted by Wynkyn de Worden 1496. It has been attributed to Dame Juliana Berners, although some of it was certainly written by her. The second edition contains the popular "Treatyse on Fyshynge with an Angle." It has been many times reprinted. The original edition was reprinted in facsimile by Eliot Stock in 1881.

Book of Sentences. See the extract.

Of this kind is the "Book of Sentences" of Peter the Lombard (bishop of Paris), which, on that account, was called the Master of Sentences. This work, finished in 1150, was published in the twelfth century, and was long the text and standard of such discussions. The questions are developed by the method of "sic et non," of the Fathers of the Church; and are divided into four books, of which the first contains questions concerning God and the doctrine of the Trinity in particular; the second is concerning the creation; the third, concerning Christ and the Christian religion; and the fourth treats of religions and moral duties. Whewell, Ind. Sciences, I. 317.

Borel (bo-rel'), Pétrus. Born at Lyons, June 28, 1809; died at Mostaganem, July 14, 1859. A French journalist and man of letters. See the extract.

Pétrus Borel, one of the strangest figures in the history of literature. Very little is known of his life, which was spent partly at Paris and partly in Algeria. He was perhaps the most extravagant of all the Romantics, surnaming himself "Le Lycanthrope," and identifying himself with the extravagances of the Boutsingots, a clique of political literary men who for a short time made themselves conspicuous at Paris. Borel wrote partly in verse and partly in prose. His most considerable exploit in the former was a strange preface in verse to his novel of "Madame Putiphar": his best work in prose, a series of wild but powerful stories entitled "Champavert." His talent altogether lacked measure and criticism, but it is undeniable.
Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 545.

He was created cardinal by his father in 1492, procured the murder of his brother Giovanni, Duke of Gandia, by assassination, and resigned his cardinalate in 1497, in order to marry Charlotte d'Albret, sister to John III. of Navarre. He married Carlotta, daughter of Alfonso, King of Naples, in 1500, and in the same year was created Duke of Romagna by Louis XII. In 1501 he married Lucrezia Borgia, widow of Alfonso, Duke of Bisceglia, natural son of Alfonso II., King of Naples. Alfonso was murdered in 1501. He then set by force and practise the conquest of Romagna, which was ruled by Louis' lieutenants. In 1502 he made peace with the commanders of his army, who revolted, but kept an independent hereditary power in Romagna. He then reduced Romagna, Urbino and the Marches, and Perugia, having previously taken Camerino, Piombino, and Pesaro. Julius II. (1503–13) was elected pope in succession to Pius III. (1503), and by his influence Alfonso V. was compelled to restore the conquered lands. Alfonso of Aragon, who was married to Lucrezia Borgia, was murdered in the cathedral of Rome. He entered the army in 1856, took part in the Kabyle expedition in 1857, was with the expedition to Cochin China in 1861, was chief of battalion in the army of Paris during the Franco-German war, and (1884) was placed in command of the army of occupation in Tunis, with the rank of general of division. He became minister of war in the cabinet formed by M. de Freycinet, Jan. 7, 1886, which post he retained during the ministry of M. Goblet. He organized democratic reforms in the army, and posed as the leader of the party of revenge against Germany, which gave him great popularity. Left out of the ministry formed by M. Rouvier, May 30, 1887, he began a violent course with the various revolutionary groups — the Intransigeants of M. de Rochefort, the league of Patriots of M. Déroulède, the jeune école, and with the Comte de Paris and the Orléanists. Hoping by means of this alliance to make himself dictator, he adopted the cry for the revision of the constitution, and, being furnished by the Duchesse de Rohan d'Ars and the Comte de Paris was elected by a large majority in the Nord in the election of April 8, 1888. In July, 1888, he fought a duel with the aged premier Floquet, in which he was severely wounded. In January, 1889, he was elected by the city of Paris, and later by a number of departments. The Boulangist movement had now assumed such proportions that the Floquet cabinet was formed specially with a view to putting it down. Frightened by the attitude of M. Constans, the minister of the interior, Boulanger fled, April 2, 1889. Tried by the Senate for conspiracy, he was sentenced in contumaciam to perpetual imprisonment. He passed his exile in Jersey, Guernsey, and Brussels, where he killed himself on the grave of his mistress, Madame Bonnemain.

Bourbon (bōr'bun; F. pron. bōr-bōn'). House of. [ME. Borbon, OF. Bourbon, Borbon, F. Bourbon, Sp. Borbon, It. Barbone, ML. Borbo(n-), Barbo(n-), inabl. Barbone castro, Barbone castro, Bourbon castle. Cf. Barbona, now Bourbonne-les-Bains, Barbone riveria, now Bourbon-l'Archambault.] A royal house of France, Navarre, Naples; so called from a castle in the quondam district of the Bourbonnais in central France. The first sire of Bourbon was Adhemar or Aimar, who lived about 921. His descendant Beatrix heiress of Bourbon, married 1272 Robert of Clermont, a son of Louis IX. of France, who became the founder of the Bourbon branch of the Capetian dynasty. Antoine de Bourbon married Jeanne d'Albret, heiress of Navarre, 1548, and became king of Navarre 1554. Their son Henry became king of France as Henry IV., 1589. The Spanish branch of the house of Bourbon descends from Philippe, duke of Anjou (grandson of Louis XIV.), who became king of Spain 1700. His second son Charles became king of Naples (and Sicily) as Charles IV., 1735. Charles acceded to the Spanish throne 1759, and his descendants (Naples and Sicily) to his son Ferdinand IV, who became the founder of the Neapolitan branch. In France Henry IV. was succeeded by his descendants in the direct line: Louis XIII., 1610–43; Louis XIV., 1643–1715; Louis XV., 1715–74; Louis XVI., 1774–93; Louis XVIII., 1814–24; and (during the Hundred Days) Louis XVII., the infant who was deposed and executed by order of the National Convention, and Louis XVIII. was occupied by the French Revolution and the reign of Napoleon I. Charles X. was compelled to abdicate by the July revolution at Paris, 1830, which placed Philippe I. on the throne. Louis Philippe represented a younger branch of the house of Bourbon, known as Bourbon-Orléans, which derived its origin from Philip, duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIV. Louis Philippe was deposed by the revolution of 1848. In Spain Philip V. was succeeded by Ferdinand VI., 1746–59; Charles III., 1759–88; Charles IV., 1788–1808; Ferdinand VII., 1814–33; Isabella II., 1833–68; Alfonso XII., 1875–85; and Alfonso XIII., the present occupant of the throne. The interval between 1808 and 1814 was occupied by the reign of Joseph Bonaparte; that between 1868 and 1875 by a revolutionary provisional government, by the reign of Amadeo, second son of Victor Emmanuel, and by a republic. From Naples Ferdinand IV., who ascended the throne in 1759, was expelled by Napoleon in 1805. He withdrew to Sicily, where he maintained himself during the domination of the French under Joseph Bonaparte and Murat at Naples. On being restored to Naples in 1815, he assumed the title of Ferdinand I., king of the Two Sicilies. He died in 1825, and was succeeded by Francis I., 1825–30; Ferdinand II., 1830–59; and by Francis II., 1859–60. Francis II. was expelled by his subjects, with the assistance of Garibaldi, and his dominions were united to those of Victor Emmanuel. Important branches of the royal house of Bourbon are the princely houses of Condé and Conti and the ducal house of Parma.

Braga (brä'gä). [L. Bracara, Braeara Augusta, Bracaraugusta, from Bracarees or Bracari, a tribe name.] A city in the district of Braga, province of Minho, Portugal, 33 miles northeast of Oporto. It contains a cathedral, founded in the 12th century, but remodeled almost throughout in the latest Pointed style. The front shows a graceful triple porch of florid work elaborately carved. There is a raised choir with well-sculptured Renaissance stalls, and a sacristy connected with it by a richly-carved chapel with some historic tombs. There is also a picturesque church of Bom Jesus, on a high hill, the ascent to which is bordered with 12 gilded and colouring groups of large colored wooden figures illustrating the stations of the cross, etc., and with fountains typifying the five senses and the Christian virtues. The church example in design and well proportioned, is preceded by pyramids and statues: the fine wooden retable portrays the Crucifixion. The combination of nature and art is both curious and beautiful. Population, about 19,000.

Brahe (brē; Dan. pron. brä'e), Tycho. Born at Knudstrup, in Scania, Sweden, Dec. 14 (O. S.), 1546: died at Prague, Bohemia, Oct. 24 (N. S.), 1601. A celebrated Danish astronomer. He built, under the patronage of Frederick II. of Denmark, an observatory, the Uranienborg, completed 1580, on the island of Hveen; and, entering the service of the emperor Rudolph II., settled at Prague in 1599. He discovered a new star in Cassiopeia in 1572, discovered the variation of the moon and the fourth inequality of the motion of the moon, and is said never to have been surpassed as a practical astronomer, although he rejected the Copernican system.

Brahma (brä'mä). Brahman (brä'man). [The Sanskrit has a neuter word brahman (nominative brahma), and a masculine brahman (nominative brahmā); from the root brh, 'be thick, great, strong,' causative 'make great, strengthen.'] 1. The neuter word brahman means: (a) Devotion. (b) A sacred formula: especially, a spell. (c) The designation Brahmaveda Adhyāya, a section usually known as the Atharaveda. (e) The Brāhmana (neuter), the highest object of theosophy, God thought of as impersonal, the Absolute. (d) The class of Brahmans and fosterers of sacred knowledge: theologians, Brahmans.

2. The masculine word brahman (nominative brahmā) means: (a) A prayer, worshiper, and then a prayer by profession, a priest, a Brahman; also one who knows this formula or spells, or sacred knowledge in general. (b) He who knows sacred science in the narrower sense; the chief priest, who conducts the sacrifice and is obliged to know the three Vedas. A particular priest, the assistant of the Brahman in the soma sacrifice. (c) Brahma, f. e. the neuter Brahman conceived as a person. (d) Brahmā is figured with four heads and a stretched out god of popular origin. He is not known in the older books. In many passages the word that the native commentators regard as masculine is to be taken as neuter. Brahmanism has no Trinity in the Christian sense. The personal god Brahma (masculine), who is called "the Creator," is himself evolved out of the one impersonal Brahma (neuter). Behind this again is the personal Brahma: then becomes the Evolver of the Universe, while Vishnu is associated with him as its maintainer, and Shiva as its destroyer. These three gods constitute the well-known Hindu Trīmurti. There are believed to be only two temples of Brāhma in India: one at Pushkara (Pokhar), the other about 15 miles from Idar. The popular view is that the functions of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva are interchangeable, and that both Vishnu and Shiva may be identified with Brahma, or no two principal deities. Brahma is usually depicted with four black faces, each of which is supposed to be directed toward one of the four quarters of the compass. In fact three have only the appearance, each being represented eyes. The four-faced head is covered by a broad red turban, and over that hang umbrella-shaped ornaments. The image is dressed in red clothes.

Brahmagupta (brāh-ma-gōp'ta). A Hindu astronomer whose date, according to Albiruni, is A. D. 664. Albiruni gives a notice of his recast of an earlier Brahmasiddhanta. To him also belongs, according to the same author, a work named "Khargana," or unpublished, which he calls Arkand. This also bears the Sindhend (i. e. the five Siddhantas), and the system of Aryabhat (Aryabhata) were the works which were principally studied in Arabian part translated by the Arabs in the 8th and 9th centuries.

Brahmana (brah'ma-na). [Skt. brahmanat, apparently 'relating to the brahman or worship.'] Dicta on matters of faith and worship; especially "a Brahmana," as designation of one of a class of Vedic writings which contain these dicta. Their object is to connect the songs and sacrificial formulæ of the Veda with the rite. They contain the oldest rituals, linguistic explanations, traditional narratives, and philosophical speculations we have. They originated in the Brahmanic schools, and were handed down by oral tradition and preserved as well as supplemented in their families and by their disciples. A comparatively large number of Brahmanas is still extant, owing to their being each annexed to a particular Veda, as well as to a sort of jealousy among the families in which the study of the different Vedas was hereditarily transmitted. The Brahmanas of the Rigveda treat especially of the duties of the Hotri who recites the verses; those of the Yajurveda to the sacrifices by the Adhvaryu; and those of the Samaveda to the offerings by the Udgātar. The Brahmanas embrace also the treatises called Aranyakas and Upanishads.

Brahmapurana (brāh'ma-pō-rā'na). In Sanskrit literature, one of the eighteen Puranas: so called as revealed by Brahma to Daksha. This Purana is sometimes placed first, and therefore called Adipurana. Its main object appears to be the promotion of the worship of Krishna. It describes the creation, the Manvantaras or the life or period of a Manu, the history of the solar and lunar dynasties to the time of Krishna, Orissa with its temples and groves, the life of Krishna, and the mode of Yoga or contemplative devotion. It was not compiled earlier than the 13th or 14th century.

Brahmandapurana (brāh-mān'da-pō-rā'na). In Sanskrit literature, one of the eighteen Puranas: so called as revealed by Brahma, and containing an account of "the egg of Brahma," the mundane egg, and the future Kalpas or days of Brahma. It is extant only in a number of unauthentic fragments.

Brahmaputra (brāh'ma-pō'tra). A river of Asia, probably the ancient Dyardanes or Oedanes. In its upper course in Tibet it is called the Sanpo (Tsan-pu, etc.); in Assam the Dihong. It rises in Lake Manasowar, and flows east and south. The name (Brahmaputra) is sometimes given to the stream formed by the main river, the Dihong, with the Dibong and Brahmakunda. It sends part of its water to the Ganges, and forms with the Ganges a vast delta at the head of the bay of Bengal. Length, 1,800 miles. Navigable to Dibrugarh, about 800 miles.

Brahmaputra Valley Division. A division of Assam, India. Area, 21,414 square miles. Population (1881), 2,249,185.

Brahmasabha (brāh'ma-sa'bhā), or Brahmiyasamaj (brāh-mē'ya-sa-mäj'). "The society of believers in God": the theistic church founded by the Hindu religious and social reformer Rammohun Roy at Calcutta in 1830.

Brahmasamaj (brāh-ma-sa-mäj'); in Bengal, Brahmosomaj (brāh'mo-sō-mäj'). "The society of believers in God": the later name of the Brahmasabha of Rammohun Roy. It was joined in 1841 by Debendranath Tagore, who undertook the task of organizing it with properly appointed officers and teachers, a settled form of worship, and a fixed standard of faith and practice. This was completed by the end of 1843. The year 1844 may be given as the date of the real commencement of the first organized theistic church of India. Its history has been marked by various schisms, but it has exercised a powerful influence against idolatry and greatly promoted social reform.

Brahmins (brā'minz), also Brahmans (brā'manz). Hindus of the highest or priestly caste. See Brahma.

Bramante (brä-män'te). Donato d'Angnolo. Born at Monti Asdrualdo, near Urbino, about 1444; died March 11, 1514. A celebrated Italian architect. He studied painting before architecture. About 1472 he established himself in Milan, and lived in northern Italy the greater part of his life. He abandoned Milan for Rome in 1499, and became the greatest master of the Roman style growing up about the antique ruins. His principal works in Rome are: (a) the Chancelleria built for the Cardinal Raffaello Riario, nephew of Pope Sixtus IV., his first work in Rome. The columns in the famous courtyard were taken from the old Basilica of San Lorenzo in Damaso, and were originally taken from the Portico of Pompey. (b) The Tempietto (1502) in the Palazzo Giraud-Torlonia (1503). (d) The cloisters of Santa Maria della Pace (1504). He was employed by Popes Alexander VI. and Julius II. in the decoration of the Vatican with the long gallery connecting the old palace with the Belvedere, the court of the Loggia finished by Raphael, containing the frescos of Raphael, and the first plan of St. Peter's. (See St. Peter's.) Bramante's design has been considered by Michelangelo and all architectural critics as the best of the many which were made for this church. It was a Greek cross with a dome and two spires, and instead of the single great order of the interior employed two orders superimposed as in the Ospidali Maggiori. The first stone was laid on April 18, 1506. As an military engineer Bramante served Julius II. in the capture of Bologna and Mirandola, and built the fine old fort at Civita Vecchia.

Brancaleone (brän-kä-lā-ō'ne). Dandolo. Died at Rome, 1258. An Italian statesman of Bolognese origin, elected by the people podestà, or senator, of Rome in 1253, with the power of enforcing justice, and the command of the military forces. He repressed the nobles and forced the Pope (Innocent IV.) to recognize the power of the people, but his government was not such as to satisfy, and he was driven from the city. Two years later, however, he was recalled.

Branchus (brang'ki-dē). [Gr. Βραγχίδαι, descendants of Branchus (Βράγχος), and the name of their seat near Miletus, Asia Minor.] In ancient geography, a small town in Sogdiana, said to have been built by the priests of Apollo Didymeus near Miletus: it was destroyed by Alexander the Great. Temple of Apollo Didymæus. A very ancient sanctuary rebuilt at a late date on so great a scale that it was never finished. Its temple was in plan 166 by 362 feet; Ionic, dexastyle, dipteral, with twenty-one columns on each flank, and four between ante in the pronaos. The columns are 68 feet high. A second way, bordered with archaic seated statues, the best of which are now in the British Museum, led from the seashore to the temple.

The name Branchidæ, as the name of a phratry, is curious. The form properly applied to the priestly family to which was committed the superintendence of the oracle and may be compared with such names as Eumolpidæ, Iamidæ, &c. . . . According to the local traditions they were descended from Branchus, a Thessalian; or according to others a Delphian, the original founder and priest of the temple of whom a legend was told similar to that of Hyacinthus. Isaac Taylor: Greek Metrol., III. 57, note.

Brandenburg (brand'den-burg). A city in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated on the Havel 35 miles west-southwest of Berlin. It contains a cathedral and a church of St. Catherine. It was an old Slavonic stronghold: was taken by Albert the Bear in 1157, and was long the principal place in the mark of Brandenburg. Population (1890), 37,487.

Brandenburg. A Gothic margravate and electorate of the German Empire, the forerunner of the kingdom of Prussia. The Northmark (see Nordmark) was granted in 1134 to Albert the Bear, who took the title of Margrave of Brandenburg. He conquered Priegnitz in 1157, and received Brandenburg in 1170. The Brandenburg was made in his reign an electorate, and he furthered the Germanizing and Christianizing of the country. He was installed in 1173–74. In 1415 Frederick of Hohenzollern (Burgrave of Nuremberg) received the mark and electorate of Brandenburg, and was formally invested with it in 1417. The mark consisted then mainly of the Altmark, Priegnitz, and the Mittelmark. The Neumark was added (mainly) about 1415–40, the Neumark (mainly) about 1450. It accepted the Reformation. It acquired Cleves, Mark, and Ravensberg in 1609 (formally 1666), and the duchy of Prussia was united with it in 1618. During the reign of Frederick William, the Great Elector (1640–88), it acquired, partly by conquest from Sweden (Hinter) Pomerania, and the bishoprics of Halberstadt, Minden, and Kamin (nominal archbishopric of Magdeburg). It became the kingdom of Prussia in 1740. See Prussia.

Brandenburg. A province of Prussia. It is bounded by Mecklenburg and Pomerania on the north, West Prussia, Posen, and Silesia on the east, Silesia, the province of Saxony, and Anhalt on the south, and the province of Saxony and Hanover on the west. Brazil (brą-zil'; Pg. pron. brä-zēl'), United States of. [F. Brésil, G. Brasilien.] A republic in South America, capital Rio de Janeiro, bounded by the republic of Colombia, Venezuela, and British, Dutch, and French Guiana on the north, the Atlantic on the east, Uruguay on the south, the Argentine Republic, Paraguay, Bolivia, Peru, and Ecuador on the west. It extends lat. 4°N.–33° 45′ S., long. 35°–72° W. The southeastern portion is mountainous. The central, northeastern, and western parts are occupied by a great plateau, with the low plains of the Amazon to the north, and those of the Paraguay to the west. North of the Amazonian plains a portion of the Guiana plateau is included in Brazil. The northern region is largely covered by the Amazonian basin are covered with forest; the remainder is more or less open land. The principal rivers are the Amazon and its tributaries, Parnaguay and São Francisco, with the Uruguay and Paraná on the frontiers. Brazil is very rich in agricultural resources, and exports coffee, sugar, hides, rubber, cotton, tobacco, etc. It contains 20 states, and the federal district of Rio. Its government is a federal republic with a president and a congress consisting of a senate of 63 members and a number of 205 deputies. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic, and the prevailing language Portuguese. The inhabitants are Brazilians, Indians, negroes, mixed races, and colonists from Germany, Italy, and Switzerland. Brazil was discovered by a Spaniard, Pinzon, in 1499, and independently by the Portuguese Cabral in 1500. As the coast was in the hemisphere which by the Pope's decree belonged to Portugal, it was claimed and colonized by the Portuguese, and was the residence of the exiled Portuguese royal family in the Napoleonic period. Its independence was proclaimed in 1822. An empire was formed, and Dom Pedro, son of the Portuguese king, became the first emperor. He was compelled to resign in 1831 in favor of his son, Pedro II. Brazil was in 1865–70 allied with the Argentine Republic and Uruguay against the dictator Lopez of Paraguay, who was defeated. She abolished slavery in 1888. By the revolution of Nov. 15 and 16, 1889, the empire was overthrown, the imperial family compelled to leave Brazil, and a provisional government under Fonseca was established. A national congress was summoned in 1890, which in 1891 proclaimed the constitution of the United States of Brazil. Fonseca, the first president, assumed the dictatorship in 1891, but was obliged to resign the same year, and was succeeded by Peixoto as president. Revolts have occurred especially in Rio Grande do Sul and Matto Grosso, and in 1893 a serious rebellion of the fleet broke out under Mello. Area (claimed), 3,210,878 square miles. Population (official estimate of 1888), 14,002,305.

Brigantia (bri-gan'shi-ą). The kingdom of the Brigantes. See the extract.

To the north of the Coritavi stretched a confederacy or collection of kingdoms to which the Romans applied the single name of Brigantia. We must lean on these methodical men about the year A. D. 80, when all the combined territories extended on one coast from Hamborough Head to the Firth of Forth and on the other from the Dee or Mersey to the valleys on the upper shore of the Solway. "A line" says Mr. Skene, "drawn from the Solway Firth across the island to the eastern sea even day separates the region of the Brigantes from the tribes on the north, the Votadini and the Otadini; but this is obviously an artificial separation, as it closely follows the line of Hadrian's Wall, otherwise it would imply that the southern borders of these barbarian tribes was precisely on a line where native peasants no longer dwelt.

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist. p. 298.

Britain (brit'an or brit'n). [ME. Britaine, Bretayne (etc.), OF. Bretagne, L. Britannia.] The English equivalent for Britannia; Great Britain. In Arthurian romance "Britain" always means Brittany (Bretagne): England is called Logres or Logria.

The word "Britain," in the mouth of an Englishman, is reserved either for artificial poetry, for the dialect of foreign politics, or for the consolation of Scottish hearers. Before England and Scotland were united, the name "Britton," as including Englishmen, was altogether unheard of. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 165.

Britain (brit'an or brit'n), Benjamin, or Little. In Charles Dickens's story "The Battle of Life," at first a servant, afterward landlord, of the Nutmeg Grater Inn. He is very small, and announces himself as knowing and caring for absolutely nothing.

Britanni (bri-tan'ī). [LL. Britanni, Britones.] A Celtic people in the northwest part of Gaul, first mentioned in this location by Sidonius Apollonius. According to Jordanes they were leagued with the Romans against the West Goths. Gregory of Tours makes them subject to the neighboring Franks. They were called by the Franks Britoni; by Latin writers after the 5th century, Britanni, Britones, and their land Britannia Cismarina, modern Bretagne, Brittany. They were, in all probability, the descendants of the Dumnonii whose original home had been the southwestern part of Britain, whence they had been driven out by the Anglo-Saxons.

Britannia (bri-tan'i-ä). [L. Britannia, more correctly Brittania, Gr. Βρεττανία, from Britanni, more correctly Brittani, Gr. Βρεττανοί, Βρεττανοι.] In ancient geography (after the time of Cæsar), the name of the island of Great Britain, and specifically of the southern part of the island: in modern times, a poetical name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

However they were first constituted, the Roman divisions of Britain are the great territorial landmarks of our history. The country, before the conquest, was divided out among different tribes, who had come in on every side, and were struggling in the centre for supremacy. The Romans seem to have disregarded the limits of the existing kingdoms and the more natural features of mountain chains. Apparently, they took rivers as their landmarks. Britannia Prima, the first province, was the district south of the Thames, the Saxon Wessex under Egbert; Flavia Cæsariensis, between the Severn and the sea, was the Mercian kingdom of Offa; Britannia Secunda, west of the Severn, comprised Wales and the Welsh Marches; Maxima Cæsariensis, between the Humber and the Tyne, is the Northumbrian province of Deira; and Valentia, whose northern boundary was between the Firths of Forth and the Clyde, contained the Lowlands of Scotland and Northumberland. Toward the end of the 4th century, Valentia seems to have been abandoned.

British Museum. A celebrated museum at Great Russell street, Bloomsbury, London, founded in 1753. It contains collections of antiquities, drawings, prints, and a library of 1,750,000 volumes, 30,000 MSS. and scores of charters. The growth of the British Museum has been very rapid. Montague House was first employed in 1756 when room was needed for Sir Hans Sloane's library and collections which were bought for the nominal price of £20,000 raised by lottery. Its collection was opened to the public Jan., 1759. The Harleian manuscripts, purchased in 1755, and the royal library, largely added to from the monasteries by Henry VIII. and Edward VI., given by George II., and George IV., raised the library to a position of great importance. The new building, designed by Sir Robert Smirke and completed by his brother Sydney Smirke, was commenced soon after the beginning of the present century. In 1816 the Elgin marbles were bought for the sum of £35,000. The first great Egyptian acquisition consisted of the objects taken with the French army in 1801. In 1802 the Rosetta Stone and several sarcophagi were exhibited. A little later the collection of Sir Gardiner Wilkinson was added. The Assyrian, Babylonian, and Greek vase collections are unquestionably the best in any contemporary museum. The natural history collections have been removed to the Museum of science and art, South Kensington. The present building, finished in 1847, is one of the best structures of the "Classic Revival." The annual increase of the library is about 40,000 volumes. Modern English publications are added free of expense by a privilege, shared with the universities, of receiving gratis a copy of every book entered at Stationers' Hall.

Brutus, Lucius Junius. A Roman consul in 509 B. C. According to the (unhistorical) legend, he feigned idiocy (whence the name Brutus, stupid: probably onomatopoetic or nonsense) to avoid exciting the fear of his uncle Tarquin the Proud, who had put to death the elder brother of Brutus to possess himself of their wealth. Tarquin, alarmed at the prodigy of a serpent appearing in the royal palace, sent his sons Titus and Aruns to consult the oracle at Delphi. They took with them for amusement Brutus, who propitiated the priestess with a golden staff inclosed in a rod. When she, in response to an inquiry of Titus and Aruns as to who should succeed to the throne, replied, "He who first kisses his mother," Brutus stumbled to the ground and kissed mother earth. After the outrage on Lucretia, Brutus threw off his dissimulation, expelled the Tarquins, and established the republic (509). When they conspired to counteract his own sons Titus and Tiberius to death for having conspired to restore Tarquin. He led in 507 () an army against Tarquin, who was returning to Rome. Brutus and Aruns fell in the battle. Subject of Shelley's drama.

Brutus, Marcus Junius (adoptive name Quintus Cæpio Brutus). Born 85 B. C.: died near Philippi, Macedonia, 42 B. C. A Roman politician and scholar. Bubastus (bū-bas'tus), or Bubastis (bū-bas'tis). [Gr. Βούβαστος, Βούβαστις; Egypt. Per-Bast, the abode of Bast.] A city of ancient Egypt, the scriptural Pi-Beseth and the modern Tel-Basta, situated on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, in lat. 30° 33′ N., long. 31° 30′ E. It was the holy city of the Egyptian goddess Bast or Pasht (Greek Bubastis), whose sacred animal was the cat.

The Twenty-second Dynasty (B. C. 980) chose Bubastis for its capital. It does not appear to have given name to commerce to Egypt. Its first king the Shishak of the Bible, the Sheshong of the monuments, took an army into Palestine and carried away the treasures of the Temple.

Marriette, Outlines, p. 58.

Bubble (bub'l). A servant in Cooke's comedy "Greene's Tu Quoque." Bucaneers (buk-a-nērz'). [From F. boucanier, a curer of wild meat, a pirate, from boucaner, smoke meat, from boucan, a place for smoking meat.] A gang of adventurers and pirates which, in the 17th century, attained an almost national importance in the West Indies and on the coasts of South and Central America. It had its origin in the English French, and Dutch smugglers who carried on a clandestine trade with the spanish Island and Spanish Main. They hunted the wild cattle there, drying the meat over a fire, and gradually formed regular settlements not only on Santo Domingo but on many of the smaller islands. As they became stronger they began to prey on Spanish commerce. In 1665 they seized the island of Santa Catalina and made it their headquarters. In 1670 they asked the English in the free conquest of Jamaica and this became another resort and in 1684 they settled the Bahamas. Under their celebrated leader Morgan, they ravaged the coasts of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean sea, and made expeditions inland. Porto Bello was sacked, in 1671 Morgan crossed the Isthmus and burned Panama, and from that year to 1685 the Buccaneers practically commanded the West Indian seas. Their numerous spoils were divided equally, and the capture of a ship had no larger share. French, Dutch, English, and Germans were banded together, their only bond being common interest and a hatred of the Spaniards. In 1680 they again crossed the Isthmus, seized some Spanish ships in the Pacific, and raided the western coasts of Mexico, Peru and Chile for several years. After 1690 the war between France and England tended to separate the pirates of these two nations, and the impoverished coasts could no longer support their excesses. They gradually returned to the West Indies and Europe, and were drawn into the armies and navies of different powers.

Bucareli y Urzua (bō-kä-rā'lē ē ör-thō'ä), Antonio María. Born at Seville, Jan. 24, 1717; died at Mexico, April 9, 1779. A Spanish general and administrator. From 1766 to 1771 he was governor of Cuba, and from 1771 until his death viceroy of New Spain (Mexico).

Bucentaur (bū-sen'târ). [From Gr. βοῦς, ox, and κένταυρος, centaur: but also said to be a corruption of L. ducentaurum, of two hundred (oars), or of Bucintoro (= buzino d'oro), golden bark.] The state ship of the Venetian Republic, used in the ceremony of wedding the Adriatic, which was enjoined upon the Venetians by Pope Alexander III. to commemorate the victory of the Venetians under Doge Sebastiano Zoani over the fleet of Frederick Barbarossa, in the 12th century. On Ascension day of each year a ring was dropped from the Bucentaur into the Adriatic, with the words "We espouse thee, Sea, in token of true and lasting dominion." The ceremony was attended by the entire diplomatic corps. The ship perhaps took her name from its figure-head, a centaur-head of a man and body of a bull) in her bows. Three of the name were built. The last was destroyed by the French in 1798.

Bucephalus (bū-sef'a-lus). [Gr. Βουκέφαλος, ox-headed, Βουκέφαλος, the name of Alexander's horse.] The favorite horse of Alexander the Great. His master was the only person who could ride him. He accompanied Alexander through his principal campaigns, and was buried on the banks of the Hydaspes with great pomp. Bucephalus is supposed to have been a name applied to Thessalian horses which were branded with a small head.

Bucer (bū'sėr), or Butzer (but'sėr), Martin. [G. Butzer, NL. Bucerus, whence Bucer.] Born at Schlettstadt in Alsace, 1491; died at Cambridge, England, Feb. 27, 1551. Buddha (böd'dä), [Skt., 'the enlightened,'] The title of Siddhartha or Gautama, the founder of Buddhism. From three newly discovered inscriptions of the emperor Asoka it follows that the 37th year of his reign was reckoned as the 257th from the death of Buddha. Hence it is inferred that Buddha died between 483 and 472 B. C. If being agreed that he lived to the age of 80, he was born between 562 and 552 B. C. The Buddhist narratives of his life are overgrown with legend and myth. Sensu it seeks to trace from them the history of the man. Oldenberg finds in the most ancient traditions—those of Ceylon—at least definite historical outlines. Siddhartha, as Buddha was called before entering upon his great mission, was born in the country and tribe of the Sakyas at the foot of the Nepalese Himalayas. His father, Suddhodana, was rather a great and wealthy landowner than a king. He passed his youth in opulence at Kapilavastu, the Sakyas' capital. He was married and had a son Rahula who became a member of his order. At the age of twenty-nine he left parents, wife, and only son for the spiritual struggle of a recluse. After seven years he both could himself possessed of perfect truth, and assumed the title of Buddha, 'the enlightened.' He is represented as having received a sudden illumination as he sat under the Bodhi, or 'tree of knowledge,' at Bodhgaya or Buddhagaya. For twenty-eight or, as later narratives give it, forty-nine days he was variously tempted by Mara—doubt as his doubts was whether to keep for himself the knowledge won, or to share it. Love triumphed, and he began to preach, at first at Benares. For forty-four years he preached in the region of Benares and Behar. Primitive Buddhism is only to be gathered by inference from the literature of a later time. Buddha did not arise himself against the old religion. The doctrines were rather the outgrowth of those of certain Brahmanical schools. His especial concern was salvation from sorrow, and so from existence. There are "four noble truths": (1) existence is suffering; (2) the cause of pain is desire; (3) cessation of pain is possible through the suppression of desire; (4) the way to this is the knowledge and observance of the "good law" of Buddha. The end is Nirvana, the cessation of existence. Buddhism was preached in the vulgar tongue, and had a popular literature and an elaborately organized monastic and missionary system. It made its way into Afghanistan, Bactriana, Tibet, and China. But in India it died out from Brahmanical persecution, but rather from internal causes, such as its too abstract nature, too morbid view of life, relaxed discipline, and overgrowth of superstitionism, and also because Siva and Vishnuism employed many of its own weapons more effectively. The system has been variously modified in passing into the various countries in which it has spread. It is optical. It is supposed to number about 350,000,000 of adherents, who are principally in Ceylon, Tibet, China, and Japan.

Buddha-Gaya (bö'dhä-gī'ä). An ancient center of Buddhism, now in ruins, in the Gaya district, Bengal. The temple is a celebrated foundation in the Buddhist faith. It is a quadrangular pyramidal structure on a raised basement, 60 feet square and 160 feet high. The exterior faces are divided into piers, and ornamented with mobbed bands and panels forming nine stages or stories, and surmounted by a conical finial. In the interior is a small vaulting arches, which date probably from a 14th-century restoration.

He was called to the bar, but his association with his cousin Addison induced him to turn his attention to literature. He contributed thirty-seven papers to the "Spectator," in Addison's style. He wrote many pamphlets, and a tragedy, "Cato Major, or the Distressed Roman." The latter, a weekly periodical which ran for about two years. He filled a number of positions after the accession of George I., when Addison became secretary to the lord lieutenant of Ireland. Being at length excluded entirely by the lords justices, deputy clerk of the council, accountant-general and member of the Irish House of Commons, he fell into money difficulties which affected his brain and after a disgraceful affair connected with the disappearance of some bonds belonging to the estate of Martha Price, a ward in chancery, for whom he married a daughter, Anne Eustace, who went upon the stage.

At the age of nineteen he traveled in Italy in company with Lord Kingston, and in 1733 began the translation of Newton's "Treatise on Fluxions." He was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris in 1739, and in the same year was appointed to the intendancy du Roi, the present Jardin des Plantes. His chief work is the "Histoire naturelle, générale et particulière, avec la description du Cabinet du Roi." Fifteen volumes of which were published in 1749. The first volume contained "La théorie de la terre" and "Le système sur la formation des planètes"; the second, "Histoire générale des animaux" and "L'Histoire particulière de l'homme"; the third, a "Description du cabinet du roi" (or Buffon's own museum) and "Les variétés de la race humaine." The next twelve volumes (1755–67) dealt with the history of quadrupeds. Subsequently he published in ten volumes "L'Histoire naturelle des oiseaux et des minéraux" (1771–86). These seven volumes had "supplements" (1774–89). The most striking of these is the fifth volume, "Les époques de la nature" (1779). Lacepède completed Buffon's work (1788–1804) by publishing a volume, "Les serpents," in 1789. The credit for the six volumes on "Les poissons et les cétacés" (1799–1804) belongs to Lacepède alone. When Buffon was admitted to the French Academy in 1753, he delivered as his inaugural address the famous "Discours sur le style."

In 1655 he joined a nonconformist body at Bedford, whither he removed probably in 1656. He was appointed a preacher by his co-religionists in 1657, and so preached throughout all the midland counties. He was arrested in 1660 at Lower Samsell by Barlington, near Bedford, under the statutes against nonconformists, and, with a brief interval in 1666, was detained in prison at Bedford until 1672, when those statutes were suspended by Charles II. He was licensed to preach by the crown May 9, 1672, and during the remainder of his life was pastor of the nonconformist congregation at Bedford. During his imprisonment he wrote part of his celebrated allegory "The Pilgrim's Progress," which appeared in 1678 (second part 1684). A complete collection of his writings, edited by Samuel Wilson, appeared in 1736, and contains, besides "The Pilgrim's Progress," a number of works, including "Grace Abounding, etc.," "The Holy War," and "Life and Death of Mr. Badman."

Burbage (ber'bāj), James. Died in 1597. An English actor, and the first builder of a theater in England: father of Richard Burbage. He was originally a joiner. In 1576–77 he erected the first building specially intended for plays. It was "between Finsbury Fields and the public road from Bishopsgate and Shoreditch." It was of wood, and was called "The Theatre." The material was removed to the Bankside in 1598 and was rebuilt as the Globe Theatre. The Curtain was put up near The Theatre soon after the latter was opened, and Burbage was instrumental in the conversion of a large house at Blackfriars into Blackfriars Theatre about Nov., 1596.

Burbage, Richard. Born in 1567 (?): died in 1619. A noted English actor, son of James Burbage (died 1597). He made his fame at the Blackfriars and the Globe of which, with his brother and sister, he was proprietor. He created the principal parts in all the best plays produced at the time. Shakspere was a member of the Lord Chamberlain's Company, playing at Blackfriars at this time, and had some part in the profit of the house, as also a little later in the Globe; but Burbage apparently had the lion's share. There is no authentic account of any intimacy with Shakspere till after 1596. Burbage seems to have been the original Hamlet, Lear, and Othello. He excelled in tragedy, and was held in the very highest esteem by authors and public: he was even sometimes introduced into plays in his own proper person. Many poems and tributes were written in his memory. Besides his fame as an actor he was known as a painter. In 1613 the Globe Theatre burned down, and he narrowly escaped with his life.

See Burgundy.

Burgundian Dynasty (1094–1383). A reigning house of Portugal which referred its origin to Henri, grandson of Robert, first duke of Burgundy. Henri was appointed count of Portugal by Alphonso VI. king of Leon, Castile, etc., in 1093, and was in 1112 succeeded by his son, Alfonso I., who erected Portugal into an independent kingdom in 1143. The legitimate line of the house of Burgundy became extinct in 1383 with the death of Ferdinand I., and was succeeded in 1385 by an illegitimate branch, the house of Avis. An illegitimate branch of the latter house, the house of Braganza, succeeded to the throne in 1640, and was followed in 1853 by the present reigning house, the house of Braganza-Coburg. The sovereigns of the house of Burgundy were: Henri (1094–1112), Alfonso I. (1112–85), Sancho I. (1185–1211), Alfonso II. (1211–23), Sancho II. (1223–48), Alfonso III. (1248–79), Dinis I. (1279–1325), Alfonso IV. (1325–57), Pedro (1357–67), Ferdinand I. (1367–83).

Burgundy (bėr'gun-di). [F. Bourgogne, It. Borgogna, Sp. Borgoña, G. Burgund, Mil. Burgundi, from LL. Burgundio, also Burgundiones, a Germanic tribe. See Burgundian.] A general geographical division in western Europe, whose limits and character have varied greatly. For the principal significations of the name, see the subtitles.

I. The kingdom of Burgundy (regnum Burgundionum), founded A. D. 406, occupying the whole valley of the Saône and lower Rhone from Dijon to the Mediterranean, and including also the western half of Switzerland. It was declared by the sons of Clovis in A. D. 534.

II. The kingdom of Burgundy (regnum Burgundiæ), mentioned occasionally under the Merovingian kings as a separate principality, and under the Carolingians appearing in somewhat narrower than those of the older kingdom last named.

III. The kingdom of Provence or Burgundy (regnum Provinciæ seu Burgundiæ) — also, though less accurately, called the kingdom of Cis-Jurane Burgundy — was founded by Boso in A. D. 879, and included Provence, Dauphiné, Piedmont, Savoy, and the country between the Saône and the Jura.

IV. The kingdom of Transjurane Burgundy (regnum Jurense, Burgundia Transjurana, Burgundia Regia) was, A. D. 888, recognized in the same year by the emperor Arnulf as ruled by the count-palatine of Saxony, and all Switzerland except the Grisons and Valais.

The kingdom of Lesser (or Cis-Jurane) Burgundy, also (regnum Arelatense), formed by the union, under Conrad the Pacific, A. D. 937, of the kingdoms of Transjurane Burgundy and Italy. On the death, in 1032, of the last independent king, Rudolf III., it came partly by bequest, partly by conquest into the hands of the emperor Conrad II., and thenceforward remained a constant part of the empire. In the thirteenth century, France began to absorb it, but by far the most was conquered and added to Savoy in 1601 (except Bresse, Bugey, Gex, and Valromey).

VI. The Lesser Duchy (Burgundia Minor) (Ducatus Burgundi cognominatus) was nearly identical with the modern political boundaries of the modern department of Côte-d'Or. It was first known as Burgundy (Duchy) under the partage of Verdun, which had belonged to Charlemagne. It disappeared from the map as an entity, of the house of Capet, when it gave to the thirteenth son, Hugh, a separate principality. Legally it was a part of the empire, till A. D. 1601, though practically independent long before that date.

VII. The Free County or Palatinate of Burgundy (Burgundiæ comitatus Palatinus) — called also Upper Burgundy (or the Upper County), and Cis-Jurane Burgundy — with property bounded, in between the Saône and the Jura, by Bresse, a part of III. and V., and was therefore a part of the empire. The French dukes of Burgundy claimed sovereignty in it, but in vain. Its capital, the imperial city of Besançon, was given to Spain in 1668, and by the treaties of Nimwegen, 1678–79, it was ceded to France (Franche-Comté).

VIII. The Independent Burgundy (Burgundia Transjurana) was in what is now western Switzerland, and between it and the Aar to the north-east, Lake Geneva and Savoy on the south, Dauphiné on the west, and Lorraine and Alsace on the north. It was first heard of as a kingdom in A. D. 888, and is hardly mentioned after the thirteenth century.

IX. The modern Burgundy (Circulus Burgundiæ) embraces Burgundy (VI.) and the seventeen provinces of the Netherlands, which it inherited from his grandmother Marie, daughter of Charles the Bold.

James Bruce, Holy Roman Empire, Appendix p. 447.

X. The Duchy of Burgundy (Lower Burgundy, a great French fief held by vassalage of the kings) and Capetian princes and dukes, and by the Grand Dukes son Philip the Bold. Its capital was Dijon. Flanders and the County of Burgundy were united to it in 1363. It was ruled by Philip the Bold (1363–1404), John the Fearless (1404–1419), Philip the Good (1419–67), and by Charles the Bold (1467–77). Under the two latter it was greatly extended in Belgium, and Charles the Bold's daughter Marie became one of the most powerful princesses in Europe. On the death of Charles the Bold (1477) the duchy proper passed (1479) to France. Flanders, Artois, Hainaut, Brabant, and Low Countries passed by the marriage of Mary (daughter and successor of Charles the Bold) to the house of Hapsburg. (Compare Merovingian, Charles the Bold.) The Duchy of Burgundy is now a province and great government of France. It is bounded on Champagne on the north, Franche-Comté and Savoy on the east, Dauphiné and Lyonnais on the south, and Bourbonnais, Nivernais, and Orléanais on the west, and corresponds to the departments Côte-d'Or, Saône-et-Loire, Ain, and a part of Yonne. Its section is famous for its wines.

Bushmen (bush'men). [Tr. From S. African D. Bosjesmans.] An African race. See Hottentot, Bushman, and Pygmies.

The Bushmen are called Bakhuain by the Bechuanas, and Bakhoin by the Basutos, and Makhoin by the Barolongs. Cupe and Sechuana call them Masarwa. Hahn proposes this name for all the Bushmen, as Khoikhoin is applied to the Hottentots. The Sanlucqua is evidently sister branched the Khoikhoin, but represents an older stock, and is physically much richer in chicks. The dialects diverge considerably. The Bushmen are known by different names, according to the languages spoken in their vicinity. Thus the Amaxosa call them Pakuru, the Basutos Barsua, Rekuru by the Bechuanas Bakhoin. The name most generally given to the Pygmies and Bushmen from Gaikland to the Cape, and south of the Orange river, is the same for the whole race, owing to the fact that the Pygmies and Bushmen also speak the dialects of their Bantu neighbors, most of the Pygmy vocabularies being given by travelers as Bushmen. The pygmy Bushmen tribes are the Bechuanas in Bechuanland, the Bakala in Bechuanaland; the Makoma and Bakoba in the Kalahari desert, the Bakwakala in the Kunene valley, and the Bakwesikale northeast of them. It is not known whether the Ba-Kuse, Ba-Kundo, and Ba-Koroka near Mossamedes, southern Angola, are Bushmen or degenerated Bantu negroes.

When she learned what she had done she declared that her lips, which had tasted such food, should know no other, and died of starvation. Seven of his poems, reflecting a pure and intense passion, have been preserved.

Cabet (kä-bā'). Etienne. Born at Dijon, Jan. 1, 1788: died at St. Louis, Mo., Nov. 8, 1856. A French communist. He was an advocate by profession; was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1831; founded "Le Populaire" in 1833; and fled to England in 1834 in order to escape punishment on account of an article which he had published in that journal. He returned to France in consequence of the amnesty of 1839. He wrote "Histoire populaire de la révolution française de 1789 à 1830" (1839), and "Le vrai christianisme suivi selon le social" (1846). He established a communistic settlement, called Icarie, in Texas in 1848, which was removed to Nauvoo, Illinois, in 1850. See Icaria.

Cabeza del Buey (kä-bā'thä thil bā'e). A small town situated in the province of Badajoz, Spain, in lat. 38° 40′ N., long. 5° 17′ W.

Cabeza de Vaca (kä-bā'thä dā vä'kä), Alvar Nuñez. Born at Jerez de la Frontera, Spain, probably in 1490: died at Seville after 1560. A Spanish soldier. In 1527 he was comptroller and royal treasurer with the expedition of Pamphilo de Narvaez to Florida. He and three others were the only ones who escaped from shipwreck and the savages; after living for years among the Indians, they reached the Spanish settlements in northern Mexico in May, 1536. Cabeza de Vaca returned to Spain in 1537, and in 1540 he was appointed governor of Paraguay. He sailed with 500 men, landed on the coast of southern Brazil, and marched overland to Asuncion, the journey occupying a year. In 1543 he explored the upper Paraguay. On April 25, 1544, he was deposed and imprisoned by the colonists for alleged arbitrary acts. Sent to Spain the next year, he was tried by the Council of the Indies and sentenced to be banished to Oran, Africa; but he was subsequently recalled by the king, received a pension, and was made judge of the Supreme Court of Seville. While his case was pending before the Council of the Indies he published two works: one, "Naufragios, peregrinaciones y milagros" (1555), on his Florida adventures, and the other, "Commentarios," relating to his administration in Paraguay. Both were written for his own justification, but, making allowances for this, they are of great historical value. There are modern editions in several languages.

Cabinda, or Kabinda (kä-bēn'dä). A town and harbor of Portuguese West Africa, situated a few miles north of the Kongo estuary, in lat. 5° 30′ S., long. 12° 10′ E. It is the capital of the Kongo district of the province of Angola, and is a favorite rendezvous of American whalers. It has developed rapidly since 1885, and especially since the introduction of a high tariff in the Kongo State. In the native language the country and people are called Ngoyo. They have no head chief, but numerous petty chiefs, called kings. See Kongo and Angola.

Cabiri, or Kabeiri (ka-bī'ri). [Gr. Κάβειροι, the mighty ones.] 1. The seven planets worshiped by the Phenicians. Their father was called Sydyk ('justice').—2. In Greek mythology, certain beneficent deities of whose characteristics little is known, worshiped in parts of Greece and in the islands of Imbros, Lemnos, and Samothrace. They are possibly connected with the Cabiri of Phenicia. To both were ascribed the invention of arts, especially of ship-building, navigation, and the working of iron. Their rites were secret. The mysteries of the Cabiri of Samothrace were regarded as inferior only to the Eleusinian in sanctity. The initiated were supposed to receive special protection against mishaps, especially by sea.

Cable (kā'bl), George Washington. Born at New Orleans, Oct. 12, 1844. An American novelist, noted especially for descriptions of Creole life in Louisiana. He has written "Old Creole Days" (1879), "The Grandissimes" (1880), "Madame Delphine," "Dr. Sevier" (1884), etc.

Caboche (kä-bōsh'), Simonet. The leader of a band of ruffians in the service of the Duke of Burgundy during the civil war between the Armagnacs and the Burgundians.

Cabot (kab'ot), George. Born at Salem, Mass., Dec. 3, 1751: died at Boston, Mass., April 18, 1823. An American politician. He was United States senator from Massachusetts in 1789, and president of the Hartford Convention in 1814.

Cabot, John, It. Giovanni Caboto, Sp. Gaboto. An Italian navigator in the English service. He was probably a native of Genoa or its neighborhood, and in 1476 became a citizen of Venice after a residence of fifteen years. He subsequently removed to Bristol, England. Believing that a northwest passage would shorten the route to India, he determined to undertake an expedition in search of such a passage, and in 1495 obtained from Henry VII. a patent for the discovery, at his own expense, of unknown lands in the eastern, western, or northern seas. He set sail from Bristol in May, 1497, probably in company with his son Sebastian, and returned in August of the same year. The expedition resulted in the discovery of a part of North America, which is supposed to have been either Cape Breton Island or Newfoundland. The date of his death is unknown.

Cabot, Sebastian. Born at Bristol, England, 1477: died at London in 1557. A celebrated explorer, second son of John Cabot. It is believed that he accompanied his father in the voyage of 1497, when the shore of North America was discovered; and it is possible, but not probable, that he undertook another expedition to the North American coast in 1593. In 1517 he commanded an English expedition in search of a northwest passage, visiting Hudson Strait, and discovering as far north as lat. 67° 30′; later, it is said, he was on the northeast coast of South America and in the West Indies with an English ship. Invited by Charles V. to Spain, he was made grand pilot of Castile (1518), and commanded four ships which left San Lucar April 3, 1526. The intention was to sail to the Moluccas by the Strait of Magellan, but, lacking provisions, he landed on the coast of Brazil, where he had some encounters with the Portuguese; thence sailed southward, discovered the river Uruguay, and erected a fort there; discovered and ascended the Paraná; and explored the lower Paraguay to the present site of Asuncion. Convinced of the importance of this region, and joined by Diego García, he relinquished the voyage to the Moluccas and despatched a ship to Spain for reinforcements; meanwhile he established himself in the district of Espiritu Santo on the Paraná (lat. 32° 50′ S.). Not receiving aid from Spain, he returned in 1530, leaving a garrison at Espiritu Santo. Cabot remained in the service of Spain until the end of 1546, when he returned to England. Edward VI. gave him a pension, and he was interested in various explorations in the Baltic; in 1553 he was made life governor of the Company of Merchant Adventurers destined to trade to Russia. A map of the world published in 1544 is ascribed to Cabot.

Cabourg (kä-bör'). A watering-place in the department of Calvados, France, situated on the English Channel 14 miles northeast of Caen.

Cabral (kä-bräl'), Pedro Alvares, early writers abbreviate the name to Pedralvarez or Pedralvez. Born about 1460: died about 1526. A Portuguese navigator. After Vasco da Gama returned from India (1499), Cabral was put in command of a fleet destined to follow up Gama's discoveries. Leaving Lisbon March 9, 1500, he followed his instructions and kept far out in the Atlantic; by this means he discovered the coast of Brazil near lat. 16° 30′ S (April 22, 1500). This was two months after Vicente Yañez Pinzon had discovered the northeast coast. Cabral took possession for Portugal of the new land, which he called Santa Cruz. Sending back a ship with the tidings, he continued his voyage May 2. On May 6 he lost four ships in a storm; with the rest he reached Mozambique and finally Calicut, where he erected a factory; this was destroyed by Samorim, and Cabral then made an alliance with the sovereign of Cochin. Loading his vessels with spices, he returned, losing one ship by the way, and arrived at Lisbon July 23, 1501. Nothing is known of his subsequent life.

Cadmeia (kad-me'yä). [Gr. Κάδμεια.] The citadel or acropolis of Thebes in Bœotia, named from its mythical founder, the hero Cadmus. Two Frankish towers of some importance were built on the summit of the low hill. The only remains of the ancient fortifications consist of a stretch of ruinous Cyclopean wall on the north side, and fragments of more recent walls on the southeastern slope.

Cadmeians (kad-mē'anz). See the extract.

The Cadmeians were the Greco-Phœnician race (their name merely signifying "the Easterns") who in the ante-Trojan times occupied the country which was afterwards called Bœotia. Hence the Greek tragedians, in plays of which ancient Thebes is the scene, invariably speak of the Thebans as Κάδμειοι. Rawlinson, Herod., I. 1. 56, note.

Cadmus (kad'mus). [Gr. Κάδμος.] In Greek legend, a son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, and Telephassa. He was the reputed founder of Thebes in Bœotia, and the introducer of the letters of the Greek alphabet.

These "Phœnician letters" were also called the "Cadmean letters," having been introduced, according to a Greek legend, which is repeatedly quoted by Herodotus, by Cadmus, the hero who founded Thebes in Bœotia about 1493 B.C. Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, and Lucian merely give these Greek writings in semitic speech "the names of the East," while Lucian even declared that Palamedes "the Nauplian" was the alphabet II. [?].

It has a large import trade in timber, etc., and exports Caen stone, rapeseed, dairy products, etc. It has important manufactures. It is the seat of a university. Caen was developed by William the Conqueror. It was taken by the English in 1346 and 1417, and retaken by the French in 1450. The cathedral (Romanesque) is not ears, and was a Gromdist center in 1793. Abbaye aux Dames, or Trinité. A great Romanesque church founded by Queen Matilda (1066), with 2 large recessed portals, arcaded façade, and square flanking towers, and 3d central lantern. The solemn interior, with its superposed tiers of round arches, presents one of the most uniform examples of Norman architecture. Abbaye aux Hommes, or St. Etienne, dedicated by William the Conqueror in 1077, but, especially in its exterior, much modified later. The 2 towers and the central lantern form one of the most effective groups of this nature; they and the choir show the Norman lancets. The plain and massive nave dates from the 11th century. The church is 340 feet long; the vaulting 68 feet high. Population (1891), 45,291.

Cæpio (se'pi-o), Quintus Servilius. Lived about 100 B. C. A Roman consul (106). As proconsul in Gaul (105) he was defeated with Mallius by the Cimbri.

Cæsarea (sez-a-rē'ạ). In ancient geography, a seaport of Palestine, situated on the Mediterranean in lat. 32° 33′ N., long. 34° 54′ E.: the modern Kaisariyeh. It was erected by Herod I., in the first decennium B. C., on the site of the former Turris Stratonis, on the line of the great road from Tyre to Egypt, between Jaffa and Dora, and named in honor of Augustus. Its full name was Cæsarea Sebaste, from the name of the harbor. Herod adorned the city with many magnificent buildings. It became the residence of the Roman governors in Palestine, and was mostly inhabited by a foreign population hostile to the Jews. Here broke out the Jewish war under the governor Gessius Florus. Vespasian gave it the name of Colonia prima Flavia. It is often mentioned in the New Testament (Acts viii. 40, ix. 30, x. 1, xxi. 8, xxiii. 33, xxv. 1). About 200 A. D. it became the residence of a bishop, and possessed a Christian school at which Origen taught. It was the birthplace of the church historian Eusebius (about 270). The modern Kaisariyeh is a desolate place of ruins.

Cairo (kī'rō). [Ar. Mayr-el-Qâhira, F. Le Caire.] The capital of Egypt, situated a mile east of the Nile, in lat. 30° 3′ N., long. 31° 26′ E. It has important transit trade, and is the starting-point for tours to neighboring pyramids, the site of Memphis and Heliopolis (in the vicinity), and the upper Nile. It has suburbs of Boulak, Old Cairo, and the Fatimite caliphs about 970, and made the capital. It was taken by the Turks in 1517, was held by the French 1798–1801, and was occupied by the British in 1882. It contains a number of noted mosques: Mosque of Akbar, a square, picturesquely ornamented building surmounted by a dome covered with gilt bronze, now appropriated to the dances of the howling dervishes. The square minaret over one angle rises in recessed stages, and the entrance porch is formed of a high trifoliated arch, 60 feet high, recessed in dark and light horizontal bands. Mosque of El Azhar, founded in 970, but for the most part rebuilt at various subsequent times. It has no minaret. It is to-day also the chief existing Mohammedan university. The division of the interior surround a large central court, inclosed by pointed arcades. The sanctuary, used for the instruction, consists of nine aisles formed by 380 columns of ancient and Christian provenience. Several subordinate mosques or chapels are included in the main foundation. Mosque of El-Ghoree, with a minaret and other ornaments in the city. It was built about 1503. Mosque of Sultan Hassan, ranking as one of the chief monuments of Mohammedan architecture. It was completed in 1360 A. D. The exterior, built of stones taken from the Pyramids, consists of a massive wall about 113 feet high, inclosing an area of irregularly-lined and somewhat trapezoidal form, and the pointed brick dome of the sultan's mausoleum. The top of the wall is corbeled out about 6 feet in successive ranges of dentils, forming a cornice, and its face is diversified by panels, arches, and 4 large windows, all used sparingly. The great minaret is 280 feet high. The interior court measures 105 by 117 feet, and contains two fountains and a tank. In the middle of each side of the court opens a magnificent pointed arch. That on the east, 90 feet high and deep and 69 in span, is the largest. At the back of this niche is the mahrab (qiblah) and the mimbar (place of direction of prayer), and from it opens the mausoleum. The entrance-porch is a large archway curiously covered in by coheling out the sides for part of its rise, and then the diagonal pointed arch over the opening; its piers are ornamented with rich vertical bands and angle-columns, and with paneling. Tomb Mosque of Kait Bey, built about 1479, one of the finest pieces of architecture in Cairo. Tombs of the Caliphs, so called, properly of the Circassian Mamelukes: a number of comparatively small mosque-domes of the fifteenth century, grouped together about the Tomb Mosque of Kait Bey. They are important in Arabic architecture for their angularly pointed stone-domes covered with geometric ornament in relief, with small windows in the low drum, or in the windows, consisting of a group of two or three slender round-headed arches surmounted by one or three circular openings arranged pyramidally; and for the fine, massive pointed arches used in the lowest story. Some of them show incrustations of the beautiful colored porcelain tiles for which the older Arabic mosques of Cairo are famous. Tombs of the Mamelukes, so called, an extensive group of mosque-tombs on the southeast side of the city. They belong to the period of the Bahrite sultans, and though ruinous are architecturally notable for their fine masonry and beautiful fluted or chevroned pointed domes, and for their graceful polygonal minarets, which rise in recessed stages. Mosque of Amru, the oldest mosque in Egypt (founded 643 A. D.), and a remarkable Mohammedan monument. The inclosure is 230 feet square, with exterior walls of brick. The entrance is on the west, where a single range of arcades borders the central court, while on the north there are three ranges, on the south four, and on the east side, which is less sanctuary, six ranges. There are in all 220 columns. The arches are round or keel-shaped, and afew are pointed. Nilometer, a monument for measuring the rise of the Nile, on the island of Roda. The present Nilometer dates from about 860 A. D., it is a chamber about 18 feet square, octangularly domed, in each side of which there is a niche covered with a pointed arch, an inpettant example of the early use of this form. In the middle stands a pillar divided into 17 cubits of about 21⅓ inches. Population, 368,108.

Calderon de la Barca, Pedro. Born at Madrid, Jan. 17, 1600; died there, May 25, 1681. A celebrated Spanish dramatist and poet. He was educated first by the Jesuits and then at Salamanca, being graduated from the latter university in 1619. He had already some reputation as a dramatic writer. In 1620 and 1622 he gained the praise of Lope de Vega and the only prize in poetical contests. Until 1630 he served in the army at various times, but continued writing. In 1636 he was patronized by Philip IV., and was formally attached to the court, furnishing dramas for the royal theaters. He fought through the campaign of 1640. From this time he wrote both secular and religious plays and autos for the church, retaining a controlling influence over whatever related to the drama. In 1651 he entered a religious brotherhood. In 1663 he was created chaplain of honor to the king, and also became a priest of the Congregation of Saint Peter, and afterward its head, an office which he held till his death. Notwithstanding these religious duties, he did not cease from writing for the theater, besides which, during thirty-seven years, he composed the Corpus Christi plays which were performed every year in the cathedrals of Toledo, Seville, and Granada. His extraordinary popularity continued till his death. He himself made a list of one hundred and eleven plays and seventy (or seventy-three) sacramental autos which forms the basis for a proper knowledge of his works. One hundred and fifteen plays printed as his by the compility of booksellers have no claim whatever to his name. His "Comedias de Capa y Espada" ("Comedies of the Cloak and Sword": which see) are peculiarly characteristic, and about thirty of these can be enumerated. Among them are "La Dama Duende" ("The Fairy Lady"), "Mejor Esta que Estaba" ("It is Better than it Was"), "Peor Esta que Estaba" ("It is Worse than it Was"), and "Astrologo Fingido" ("The Mock Astrologer"). Dryden used this last in his "An Evening's Love, or The Mock Astrologer." Among his plays are "El Magico Prodigioso" ("The Wonder-working Magician"), "La Devocion de la Cruz" ("The Devotion of the Cross"), "El Principe Constante" ("The Constant Prince"), "Vida es Sueño" ("Life is a Dream"), "El Mayor Encanto Amor" ("No Magic like Love"), "Las Armas de la Hermosura" ("The Weapons of Beauty"), and many others.

Caliban (kal'i-ban). In Shakspere's "Tempest," a deformed and repulsive slave. He is a monster generated by a devil and a witch, with a sensual and malignant disposition, subsidiary to Prospero.

If the depth of an impression made by an imaginary character may be gauged by the literature which that character calls forth, then must Hamlet and Falstaff admit Caliban to a place between them. An eminent Professor Hales has called about sixteen volumes into the proof that in Caliban we find the exact "link" which, in any scheme of Evolution, is "missing" between Man and the Anthropoids. He had honoured Mr. Robert Browning has given utterance to the theological speculations which he imagined might have visited Caliban's darkened understanding; and a brilliant Member of the French Institute, of world-wide fame, has written a philosophical drama bearing the name of "Caliban." Another mixed character, except the fact of his ancestry, is Humbert Ward, who has called forth such a host of pamphlets and voluminous tributes.

Footnote. Shak. Var. Pict. xiii.

Caliban. A philosophical drama by Renan, published in 1878 as a continuation of "The Tempest." Caliban, a socialist and revolutionist, overthrows Prospero and occupies the latter's place and palace. Calif (kā'lif). [From Ar. halafa, to leave behind.] The title given to the successor of Mohammed, meaning 'successor,' 'lieutenant,' 'vicegerent,' or 'deputy.' He is vested with absolute authority in all matters of state, both civil and religious, as long as he rules in conformity with the law of the Koran and the traditions. The caliphate, or Mohammedan state, was a free man, a learned divine, a powerful ruler, a just person, and one of the kinsfolk of the tribe to which the prophet himself belonged. The Shiites or Schismatics of Islam also demand that he should be a descendant from the prophet's family. After the first two caliphs, who acted as judges, legislators, and authorities all alone entitled to the title, the others became merely governors, the caliphate passed over to the Ommiads, who, 11 in number, reigned 661-749 in Damascus. They were succeeded by the Abbasides, with 37 edits, reigning 750-1258 in Bagdad. After their temporal power had been overthrown by Hulak Khan, 1258, descendants of the Abbasides resided for three centuries in Egypt, and asserted their claim to the spiritual power. In 1517 the caliphate passed over through one descendant of the Abbasides to Selim I., the ninth of the present Ottoman dynasty of Turkish sultans, and is still vested in the sultan of the Ottoman empire.

Callirrhoe (ka-lir'ō-e). [Gr. Καλλιρροη.] A historic fountain in Athens, architecturally adorned and provided with conduits by Peisistratus, the use of whose water was prescribed for ceremonial rites. From the earliest study of Athenian topography, this fountain has been identified with the copious spring still flowing in the bed of the Ilissus, near the temple of Olympian Zeus. Dörpfeld, however, has lately demonstrated the probability that this identification is incorrect, and that the fountain was in fact situated at the southwest angle of the Areopagus, on the border of the Agora. While the evidence is still incomplete, excavation has revealed a watercourse of the Peisistratid epoch ending at the side indicated, which accords with literary testimony.

Callirrhoe. In Greek legend, the wife of Alcmæon. She persuaded her husband to procure for her the peplum and necklace of Harmonia, and thus caused his death. See Alcmæon and Harmonia.

Callisteia. See halloteia.

Callisthenes (ka-lis'the-nēz). [Gr. Καλλισθενης.] Born at Olynthus, Macedonia; died about 328 B. C. A Greek philosopher, a cousin and pupil of Aristotle, and a companion of Alexander the Great in Asia. He incurred Alexander's ill will, and was probably put to death by his order.

Callisto (ka-lis'tō). [Gr. Καλλιστω.] In Greek mythology, an Arcadian huntress, a companion of Artemis, beloved of Zeus and transformed by him into a she bear. In this form she was slain by Artemis in the chase. She was placed among the stars as the constellation Arctos (Bear).

Callistratus (kal-lis'tra-tus). [Gr. Καλλιστρατος.] An Athenian orator. He commanded with Chabrias and Timotheus the forces which were despatched to the assistance of Thebes against Sparta in 378, and executed a number of embassies. In 366 he delivered a speech on the loss of Oropus which is said to have determined Demosthenes to devote himself to the study of oratory. He was several times elected political persons in 361, as a result of which he went into exile. He subsequently returned, and was put to death. He is said to have founded the city of Datum, afterward Philippi, during his exile.

Callistratus. A Greek grammarian who lived about the middle of the 2d century B. C. He was the author of commentaries on the major poets of Greece, which were held in considerable repute by the ancients, but which are now lost. He is said to have introduced what to have been the first to acquaint the Samians with the alphabet of twenty-four letters.

Callistratus, A Roman jurist who lived about the beginning of the 3d century A. D. He is said to have been a pupil of Papinian and to have been a member of the council of Alexander Severus. He is known chiefly on account of the numerous extracts from his works in the "Digest of Justinian." None of his works is extant.

Calvary (kal'va-ri). 1. A word occurring in the New Testament (Luke xxiii. 33), adopting the calvaria by which the Vulgate translates the Greek kranion, which itself is the rendering of the Aramean golgotha, skull: it is not a proper name. The popular name "Mount Calvary" is not warranted by any statement in the gospels as being that of the place of the Crucifixion.

2. The name of the English version of Spohr's oratorio "The Saviour's Last Hours" ("Des Heilandes letzte Stunden"), first given in England in 1834.

Calverley (kal'vėr-li). A ruined gamester, brutally cruel to his wife and children, in "The Yorkshire Tragedy," once attributed to Shakspere. The story is that of a real person of that name.

Calverley, Charles Stuart. Born at Martley, Worcestershire, Dec. 23, 1831; died at London, Feb. 17, 1884. An English barrister and poet. In 1852 he resumed his family name, Calverley, which his grandfather had changed to Blayds in 1807. He wrote verse and translations (1862, 1866, 1869), and a volume of humorous verse, parodies, etc., "Fly Leaves," in 1872.

Calvert (kal'vėrt), Cecilius or Cecil, Lord Baltimore. Born about 1605; died at London, Nov. 30, 1675. The first proprietor of Maryland. He was the son of George Calvert, mentioned below, who, having applied for a grant of land in northern Virginia, died before the charter had passed the great seal, in consequence of which it was issued in the name of his heir Cecil, June 20, 1632. In June, 1633, he sent an expedition of colonists under his brother Leonard to the new domain, which was named Maryland by Charles I. in honor of his queen. He married about 1623 Anne Arundel, whose name is borne by one of the counties of Maryland.

Calvert, George, Lord Baltimore. Born at Kipling, Yorkshire, about 1580; died April 15, 1632. The founder of Maryland. He entered Parliament in 1609, and became secretary of state in 1619, a post which he resigned in 1625, on declaring his conversion to the Roman Catholic faith. He was at his resignation raised to the Irish peerage as Baron of Baltimore. While secretary of state he obtained from James I. a grant of land, called the province of Avalon, in Newfoundland, where in 1621 he established the settlement of Ferryland. He paid two visits to the colony between 1627 and 1629, which convinced him of the unsuitability of the climate, whereupon he applied for a grant of land (the present Maryland) in northern Virginia. The charter, which, as he died before it had passed the great seal, was issued in the name of his son Cecil in 1632.

Calvert, George Henry. Born at Baltimore, Md., Jan. 2, 1803; died at Newport, R. I., May 29, 1889. An American journalist, poet, and miscellaneous writer.

Calvert, Leonard. Born about 1582; died June 9, 1647. The first governor of Maryland. He was the brother of Cecil Calvert, second Lord Baltimore, by whom he was placed in command of the colonists who set sail from Cowes Nov. 22, 1633, and founded St. Mary's March 27, 1634. His claim to the jurisdiction of Kent Island was opposed by Clayborne whom he reduced to submission in 1647.

Calves' Head Club. A club said to have been instituted in ridicule of the memory of Charles I. It is first noticed in a tract reprinted in the "Harleian Miscellany," called "The Secret History of the Calves' Head Club," and undertaking to show how this club met for some years, 1693–97, on the anniversary of the king's death. An ax was reverenced, and a dish of calves' heads represented the head of his friends. It seems to have met in secret after the Restoration and till 1734, when some ill will was excited against it, and riots were said to have ensued.

Calvi (käl'vē). A fortified port on the western coast of Corsica, in lat. 42° 35′ N., long. 8° 46′ E. It was taken by the English in 1794.

Calvin (kal'vin), John, originally, in French, Jean Chauvin, or Cauvin, or Caulvin. [L. Johannes Calvinus, G. Johann Calvin, It. Giovanni Calvino; L. Calvinus, from calvus, bald.] Born at Noyon, Picardy, France, July 10, 1509; died at Geneva, May 27, 1564. A celebrated Protestant reformer and theologian. He studied at Paris, Orléans, and Bourges; embraced the Reformation about 1528; was banished from Paris in 1533; published his "Institutes" (which secured him fame) in 1536; then lived in Strasburg; and was banished in 1538, and returned in 1541. He had a controversy with Bolsec in 1551, and with Servetus in 1553 (see Servetus), and founded the Academy of Geneva in 1559.

Cam (kam), or Granta (gran'ta). A river in Cambridgeshire, England, which joins the Ouse 34 miles south of Ely. Length, about 40 miles. See Cambridge.

Camden, writing in 1586, recognizes the Cam as well as the Granta. "By what name writers termed this River, it is a question: some call it Grantha, others Canus. On Speed's map of Cambridgeshire (1610) the name Cam occurs alone, written twice, once above, and once below, Cambridge; Milton personifies it as a river-god in "Lycidas" (1638):

> "Next Camus, reverend sire, went footing slow,
> His mantle hairy and his bonnet sedge,
> Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge
> Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe;"

and on Loggan's map of Cambridge (1688) the words The Lesser Ouse are written out in full, without any other designation. On the other hand, so late as 1702, an Act of Parliament for improving the navigation speaks of the River Ouse, alias the Great. Clark, Cambridge, p. 11.

Camacho (kä-mä'cho). A rich but unfortunate man in one of the episodes in "Don Quixote." He is cheated out of his bride, Quiteria (pē-tā'ē-ä) by his prodigality and love of display. The episode, Camacho's wedding is used to signify great but useless show and expenditure. See Wedding of Camacho.

It is like Camacho's wedding in Don Quixote, where Sancho ladled out whole pullets and fat geese from the sorpotaine of a gulf. Bacon, Essays (1625), Eng. Poets, p. 150.

Camanche. See Comanche.

Cambyses (kam-bī'sēz) I. [Old Pers. Kabujiya, which is thought to be derived from the Sanskrit kah, to praise, and aja, speaker. The Greeks inserted the euphonic m before the b. An Aryan people existed in the northwest corner of India under the name of Kamboja, which has survived as the name of a country bordering on Siam.] A Persian king whose historical character is doubtful. In the genealogy of Xerxes as given by Herodotus, both he and his son Cyrus are omitted, and Perseus, where he gives this name, seems to make the father of Cyrus the Great. On the other hand, a Cambyses is mentioned whose sister was the concubine in the fourth degree of one of the seven conspirators. Possibly Cambyses I. was one of the sons of Thespies on the cuneiform monuments Chishpish-ha, and grandson of Achæmenes.

Cambyses II. The son and successor of Cyrus I., and father of Cyrus II., called "The Great." According to Herodotus he was merely a Persian noble man, but Xenophon states that he was king of the country, and his statement is confirmed by native records.

Cambyses III. The son and successor of Cyrus the Great, 529–522 B. C. He is depicted as despotic and tyrannical. He defeated Psammetichus III. (called by the Greeks Psammenitus), king of Egypt, in the battle of Pelusium (525 B. C.), and the conquered country in the Persian empire. His expeditions against Ammonand Ethiopia were unfortunate. While he was devastating Egypt an impostor assuming the name of his brother Bardia (called by the Greeks Smerdis) who was secretly assassinated at Cambyses's instigation, forced him to return to Persia, but he died on the way from a wound inflicted by himself.

Cambyses, King of Persia. A play by Thomas Preston, written as early as 1561. "In allusion to a passage in it, 'Cambyses vein' has, in consequence of its being quoted by Shakespeare, become proverbial for bombast; [but] the language of the play is in no instance specially obnoxious to this charge." Ward.

Camden (kam'den). A town in Kershaw County, South Carolina, near the Wateree River 32 miles northeast of Columbia. Here, Aug. 16, 1780, the British under Cornwallis defeated the Americans under Gates: the loss of the Americans was about 2,000, including De Kalb. Near here, at Hobkirk's Hill, April 25, 1781, the British under Rawdon defeated the Americans under Greene. The first battle is also called the battle of Sanders' Creek.

Camoens (in Portuguese spelling, Camões) (kam'ō-ens; Pg. pron. kä-mōn'ēsh). Luiz de. Born at Lisbon (?) in 1524 (?): died at Lisbon, June 10, 1580. A celebrated Portuguese poet. He was of gentle birth, and was educated at Coimbra. On leaving college he returned to Lisbon, and quickly became acustomed to court life and manners. His romantic passion for Donna Caterina de Ataide, a high-born lady in attendance on the queen, with the jealousy of another lover and the dislike of her father, was one of the principal reasons for his banishment from Lisbon about 1547. In 1550 he, having joined the army of Africa, lost the sight of his right eye in a naval engagement at Ceuta. After a careless and somewhat dissolute period, he was cast into prison in 1553 for wounding one of the king's equerries in a street fracas. He was pardoned on condition of his immediate embarkation for India, and reached Goa in the same year. He joined several naval expeditions, and on his return to Goa he devoted his pen to the exposure of the abuses so rife in the East, and became very unpopular in consequence. After seventeen years of adventure and suffering from persecution and imprisonment in Goa, Macao, Mozambique, and Sofala, he returned to Portugal in 1570. "He lived poor and neglected, and so died," is said to have been placed on a marble tablet to his memory on the wall of the church of the convent of Santa Anna, both church and tablet having been destroyed by earthquake in 1755. His great epic "Os Lusiadas" ("The Lusiad": which see), written during his banishment, and perfected in his humble home in Lisbon, was first published in 1572. Its success was great, and a second edition was published in the same year; but this only added to the reputation he was regarded at court, and when in 1578 the young king Dom Sebastian went to Africa on his fatal expedition, Bernardes, a courtier and poet, was selected to go with him and sing his triumphs. After the defeat and death of the king "Camoens went as one dreaming." Thirty-eight editions of the "Lusiad" were published in Lisbon before 1790. There are translations in nearly every language. The first English translation was by Sir Richard Fanshawe, 1655. Mickle's translation appeared in 1776. Musgrave's in 1826, Quadrio's (five cantos) in 1805, Sir Thomas Mitchell's in 1854. Camoens's influence and efforts preserved the Portuguese language from destruction during the period of the Spanish occupation, when the language of the court was Castilian. His minor works, or "Rimas," were sonnets, comedies, eclogues, ballads, and epigrams.

It is named from its hero, who bears all the worst ills of life with a cool, philosophical indifference, laughing at its miseries. See Pangloss. A second part followed, with the same name, by an anonymous writer.

Written ostensibly to ridicule philosophical optimism, and to the spur given to pessimist theories by the Lisbon earthquake, Candide is really as comprehensive as it is desultory. Religion, political government, national peculiarities, young women, publishers, love, loyalty, all come in for the unfailing sneer. The moral, wherever there is a moral, is "be tolerant, and cultivez votre jardin," that is to say, do whatever work you have to do diligently. Stoddard's Lectures, French list, p. 42.

Canterbury (kan'ter-ber-i). [ME. Canterbury, Cauntarbury, etc., AS. Cantwarabyrig (dat. Cantwarabyrg), the fortress of the Kentmen; gen. pl. of Cantware, Kentmen, and burh (dat. burg), orig. berg, a city. A city in Kent, England, situated on the Stour in lat. 51° 16′ N., long. 1° 5′ E.: the Roman Durovernum and Saxon Cantwarabyrig. Its chief object of interest is the cathedral, St. Martin's Church, St. Augustine's church (remains of the church of the monastery of St. Augustine), and many old palaces. It is on the site of a British village, and was a Roman military station and a Kentish town. Augustine here in 597 became the first archbishop. It was sacked by the Danes in 1011. The cathedral was founded in the 11th century. The existing choir was built by William of Sens, France, after 1174, and the Perpendicular nave, transepts, and great central tower are of the 15th century. It plan the cathedral is long and narrow, with double transepts. The interior is light and impressive. The choir is raised several feet, and separated from the nave by a sculptured 14th-century screen. The columns, arcades, vaulting, and clerestory are simple in character to those of the earlier style. It was while worshiping in the north transept of the cathedral on the 29th of December, 1170, that Thomas à Becket was murdered. The portion of the choir behind the altar contains several fine altar-tombs of early archbishops, and that of the Black Prince. At the extreme east end is a beautiful circular chapel called the Corona. The crypt is very large, and early Norman in style. The Perpendicular cloisters are entered at the transept. The dimensions of the cathedral are 514 by 154 feet; the height of the nave-vaulting, 80; and of the central tower, 235. St. Martin's is called the "Mother Church of England." The original foundation was no doubt pre-Saxon, and there are Roman bricks in the lower parts of the walls. The upper parts of the long, low, aisled, clerestoried structure are much later. Population (1891), 23,964.

Canterbury College. An ancient college of Oxford University. It was founded by Simon Islip, archbishop of Canterbury, in 1361 or 1362; July, Wyclif was the second warden. It was disbanded in the reign of Henry VIII., and the last remains of its buildings were demolished in 1775.

Canterbury Tales, The. A work by Chaucer (c. 1340–1400), consisting of twenty-two tales in verse, and six in prose, told by twenty-three pilgrims and of the twenty-nine who meet at the Tabard Inn in Southwark, on their way to the shrine of Thomas à Becket at Canterbury. About fifty manuscripts of the "Canterbury Tales" are known to exist. The Chaucer Society (Furnivall) has printed six of the best of them in parallel columns. These are the Ellesmere, belonging to Lord Ellesmere; the Hengwrt, belonging to Mr. William W. E. Wynne of Peniarth, the Petworth, belonging to Lord Leconfield; and our homecasts of the Chaucer collections at Oxford, Cambridge, and the British Museum. The Harleian manuscript from the British Museum, first edited by Wright for the Percy Society, was afterward reprinted. Two editions were published by Caxton, the first thought to have been printed in 1475, the second about six years later than a better manuscript. Wynken de Worde published an edition in 1495 and another in 1498; Richard Pynson one in 1492 and again in 1526. In 1532 William Thynne made an attempt to collect all Chaucer's works, both prose and verse, in one volume. It was printed by Godfray, and for two hundred and fifty years was the standard text of the "Canterbury Tales." After this they were included in all editions of Chaucer. (See Chaucer.) Professor Skeat has edited some of the separate poems. The "Canterbury Tales" are: The General Prologue, The Knight's Tale, The Miller's Tale, The Reeve's Tale, The Cook's Tale, The Man of Law's Tale, The Shipman's Tale, The Prioress's Tale, Chaucer's Tale of Sir Thopas, Chaucer's Tale of Melibeus, The Monk's Tale, The Nun's Priest's Tale, The Doctor's Tale, The Pardoner's Tale, The Wife of Bath's Tale, The Friar's Tale, The Summoner's Tale, The Clerk's Tale, The Merchant's Tale, The Squire's Tale, The Franklin's Tale, The Second Nun's Tale, The Canon's Yeoman's Tale, The Manciple's Tale, and The Parson's Tale. They were modernized by several hands and published by Tonson in 1741. Much of the work was done by Ogle (who started it), also by Samuel Boyse, Henry Burke, and Jeremiah Markland. The edition was completed when Ogle died in 1742. It was taken up by Rev. William Lipscomb in 1792. He brought out a version of The Pardoner's Tale, the rest following in 1795 the whole edition was published, including Tonson's edition. The General Prologue was modernized by Betterton, and posthumously published in 1737.

In 1523 he went to Strasburg, where he became the head reformer of the Reformation. He was the model author of the "Confessio Tetrapolitana," and devoted himself to the conciliation of the Lutherans and the Swiss reformers.

Capitol, The. [L. capitolium, from caput, head.] In ancient Roman history, that part of the Capitoline Hill which was occupied by the Temple of Jupiter Optimus. See Rome—2. As generally applied now, the Piazza del Campidoglio on the Capitoline Hill, Rome, with the palaces which face it on three sides. The piazza is approached on the northwest by a wide, inconvenient flight of steps from the Piazza Araceli in front, opposite the Palazzo di Venezia, and flanked by the P.S. Zeccolo consecrated as the Capitoline Museum. This area, occupying the depression between the citadel and the site of the Capitoline temples, is the historic center of Rome. Here Romulus, according to tradition, founded his asylum, and the earliest public assemblies met. In the 11th century, upon the revival of old memories, it again became the municipal center, as the residence of the senator, and the seat of popular meetings; and here, in the old Palace of the Senator, Petrarch was crowned in 1341, and in 1347 Rienzi was established as tribune of the people. The present Palazzo del Senatore was founded at the end of the 14th century by Boniface IX. The existing façade, with its Corinthian pilasters and round arches, as well as those of the flanking palaces, is based on designs by Michelangelo. In the center of the piazza the campo delle statue, the buried ancient bronze statue of Marcus Aurelius, which originally stood in the Forum Romanum, then near the Lateran, and has once more its present position since 1185.

3. The seat of the National Congress, at Washington, D. C., founded in 1793, and constructed according to the original designs in 1830, but since enlarged to over double its original area. It consists of a central cruciform building crowned by a great dome, and connected at each end by galleries with a large rectangular wing, one of which is used as the senate chamber and the other the Hall of Representatives. The style is Renaissance based on Neighborhood's Pantheon, the dome being inspired by that of St. Paul's. The elevation exhibits a single main story, with attic, over a high rusticated basement. The general design of the exterior is the portraeo of the central building and of the two wings with their low flights of steps. These porticos comprise Six Corinthian columns 32 feet 6 inch in diameter of their high square pedestals. The dome is 287 feet high to the top of the statue above the lantern and 96 in interior diameter; it is very impressive in effect, though unfortunate in proportion, and is of iron and stone. It rises from a circular drum, and is encircled by a fine Corinthian colonnade supporting a gallery. Beneath the dome is the rotunda, 96 feet in diameter, and adorned with a set of art relating to American history. The total length of the Capitol, north and south, is 680 feet; its width, 350.

Capitoline Hill, The. One of the seven hills of ancient Rome, northwest of the Palatine, on the left bank of the Tiber. It constituted the citadel of the city after the construction of the Servian wall. Its southwestern summit was the largest Sabrian rock, on the northeastern the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. The much in Capitol stands between the two summits. From the capitoline the Forum Romanum extends its long length to the south-west, skirting the northern foot of the Palatine.

Capitoline Museum. One of the chief museums of antiquities of Rome. It was founded in 1471 by Sixtus IV., who presented the papal collections to the Roman people, and established the Capitol as the place where the art treasures of Rome should be preserved. The museum was greatly enriched by Clement XII and Benedict XIV. The collections are in the Conservatori Palace on the left-hand side of the Piazza del Campidoglio and the Palazzo del Senatore, which was built in the 12th century from materials designed by Michelangelo. Among the most notable of the antiquities of the Capitoline Museum are the colossal statues of Marcus Aurelius, the Dying Gaul, the Satyr of Praxiteles, the Cantares by Aristeas and Papias, and the Capitoline Venus by Praxiteles.

Capua (kap'ū-ä). An ancient city of Campania, Italy, 17 miles north of Naples, famous for its wealth and luxury. It was founded by the Etruscans, was taken by the Samnites in 424 B. C., and came under Roman rule about 340 B. C. It opened its gates to Hannibal in 216 B. C. (whose army wintered there 215–215). In 211 B. C. it was retaken by the Romans, and severely punished. It rapidly regained its old rank, and became in 45 A. D. a Roman colony. It was destroyed by the Saracens in 840, and its inhabitants founded the present city. Its site is occupied by the village of Santa Maria di Capua Vetere. It contains the third or fourth largest and one of the most perfect of the ancient Roman amphitheaters which dates from the early empire. In the early middle ages it was fortified as a citadel, and has suffered from sieges. It was an imposing monument, much resembling the Roman Colosseum, and nearly as large. The axes of the outer ellipse are 557 and 488 feet; of the arena, 250 and 150 feet.

Capua (kä'pōo-ä). A town in Italy, on the Volturno, situated 2 miles north of ancient Capua, on the site of the ancient Casilinum. It was colonized from ancient Capua in the 9th century. It has a cathedral, and a museum with antiquities. Cæsar Borgia attacked it in 1501. Near it is the battle-field of the Volturno, 1860. It was taken by the Piedmontese, Nov., 1860. Population, 12,000.

Capuchins (kap'ū-chinz). A mendicant order of Franciscan monks, founded in Italy in 1528 by Matteo di Bassi, and named from the long pointed capouch or cowl which is the distinguishing mark of their dress. According to the statutes of the order, drawn up in 1529, the monks were to live by begging; they were not to use gold or silver or silk in the decoration of their altars, and the chalices were to be of pewter. The Capuchins are most numerous in Austria. In the United States they have convents in the dioceses of Green Bay, Milwaukee, Leavenworth, and New York. See Franciscans.

Carabobo. A plain south of Valencia, Venezuela, in the same valley. Here, on May 28, 1814, Bolivar with 5,000 men defeated the Spanish captain-general Cajigal with 6,000 men. On June 24, 1821, Bolivar won a second victory on the same plain over the Spanish army of La Torre. This was the last Spanish force of consequence in Venezuela, and the victory secured the independence of the northern South American states.

Caracalla (kar-a-kal'a), or Caracallus (kar-a-kal'us) (Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, originally Bassianus). [Caracalla, a nickname given him on account of the long Gaulish hooded coat or tunic which he introduced.] Born at Lyons, April 4 or 6, 188 A. D.; died near Edessa, Mesopotamia, April 8, 217 A. D. Emperor of Rome, son of Septimius Severus. Having become sole emperor by the murder of his brother Geta in 211, he murdered the latter with many of his friends, including the jurist Papinian, and made himself sole emperor. He celebrated by the Constitutio Antoniana the full citizenship to all free inhabitants of the empire, in order to increase the produce of the succession duty of five per cent. which legacies and inheritances of the property of citizens. He was murdered on a plundering expedition against the Parthians.

It had hitherto been the peculiar felicity of the Romans, and in the worst of times the consolation, that the virtue of the emperors was active, and their vices latent. Augustus, Trajan, Hadrian, and Marcus visited their extensive dominions in person, and their progress was marked by a series of active and beneficent virtues. The tyranny of Tiberius, Nero, and Domitian, who resided almost constantly at Rome, or in the adjacent villas, was confined to the senate and the capital (quotation of Caracalla was the common enemy of mankind. He left the capital (and he never returned to it) about a year after the murder of his brother. The rest of his reign was spent in the several provinces of the empire, particularly those of the east, and every province was by turns the scene of his rapine and cruelty. Gibbon, Decline and Fall, I. 166.

Carausius (ka-rā'si-us), Marcus Aurelius Valerius. Died 293 A. D. A Roman insurgent. He was a Menapian or Belgo-German by birth, and in his youth is said to have been a pilot. In 286 he distinguished himself in the campaign of Maximian. Maximian suspected the revolted Bagaudæ in Gaul, and was about this period intrusted with the enterprise of suppressing the Frankish and Saxon pirates who ravaged the coasts of Britain and Gaul. Suspected of acting in collusion with the pirates, orders were issued for his execution, whereupon he made himself master of Britain and part of Gaul in 287, and assumed the title of Augustus. He was recognized as a colleague in the government of the empire by the Augusti Maximian and Diocletian in 290. On the appointment of Galerius and Constantius Chlorus as Cæsars in 292, the latter undertook a campaign against Carausius, who was assassinated in the following year by his chief minister, Allectus.

[It., pl. of carbonaro, from L. carbonarius, a charcoal-burner, a collier.] A secret society formed in the kingdom of Naples during the reign of Murat (1808–14), by republicans and others dissatisfied with the French rule. They were originally refugees among the mountains of the Abruzzi provinces, and took their name from the mountain charcoal-burners. Their aim was to free their country from foreign domination. After having aided the Bourbons in the restoration of the French, the organization spread over all Italy as the champions of the National Liberal cause against the reactionary governments. At one time the cabinets numbered several hundred thousand members. They were concerned in the various revolutions of the times until crushed out by the Austrian power in Italy. About 1820 the spread into France created an important part in French politics until the revolution of 1830.

The ancient fortress consists of two parts, the Upper Town (la cité) and the Lower Town. The Upper Town, now practically abandoned for the more convenient site below, is in its entirety one of the most remarkable monuments of the middle ages existing. Its plan is square, about a mile in circuit, and is fenced by two lines of walls with fifty-four towers, all of admirable masonry and retaining in their arrangement the perfect system of the defensive devices evolved by mediæval military engineers. Part of the inner walls and towers dates from the Visigothic epoch of the fifth century, the outer portion from the 12th century, and the remainder of the reign of St. Louis. On one side rises a powerful castle or citadel. The battlemented turret here at Narbonne's Roman temple was, and many light and beautiful Pointed choir, with splendid glass. This imagic fortress was thoroughly restored by Napoleon III. It was a Roman town, and was ruled like the rest West Gothic. It was an Albigensian stronghold, and was sacked by the Black Prince in 1355. Population (1891), commune, 26,265.

Carchemish (kär'kem-ish). The ancient capital of the Hittites. It was formerly identified with Circesium of the Greeks and Romans, a fortified place near where the Chaboras empties into the Euphrates. Later excavations brought out its identity with the Gargamis of the Assyrian inscriptions (Egyptian Guargamesha), situated on the right bank of the Euphrates northwest of the river Sajur, and now represented by the ruins of Jerablûs. The city is mentioned in the annals of Tiglath-Pileser I., 1110 B. C.; Shalmaneser II., in 858, and Sargon, in 717, subjected this capital of the Hittites, and placed an Assyrian governor in it. In 605 B. C. the battle between Nebuchadnezzar and Necho of Egypt took place under its walls (Jer. xlvi. 2; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20), in which Egypt was thoroughly defeated by western Asia.

To Mr. Skene, for many years the English consul at Aleppo, is due the credit of first discovering the true site of the old Hittite capital (Carchemish). On the western bank of the Euphrates, midway between Birejik and the mouth of the Sajur, rises an artificial mound of earth, under which ruins and sculptured blocks of stone had been found from time to time. It was known as Jerablûs, or Kalaat Jerablûs, "the fortress of Jerablûs," sometimes wrongly written Jerabolus, and in the name of Jerablûs Mr. Skene had no difficulty in recognising an Arab corruption of Hierapolis. In the Roman age the name of Hierapolis or "Holy City" had been transferred to its neighbour Membij, which inherited the traditions and the religion of the older Carchemish; but when the triumph of Christianity in Syria brought with it the fall of the great temple of Membij, the name disappeared from the later city, and was remembered only in connection with the ruins of the ancient Carchemish.

Caria (kā'ri-ą). In ancient geography, a division of Asia Minor, lying between Lydia on the north, Phrygia and Lycia on the east, and the Ægean Sea on the south and west. The Maander, a celebrated river, flowed through it. Its chief towns were Miletus, Halicarnassus, and Cnidus. The early inhabitants were Hamitic, and the Greeks formed colonies on the coasts. Its princes became tributary to Persia.

Cariæ (kā'ri-ē), in ancient geography, a people on the south to the mouth of the Maander on the west coast. It extended inland at least as far as Caura, near the junction of the Lycus with the Maander. The chain of Latmus (Latmi Orchi) formed, apparently, its eastern boundary. Its princes at time the greater part of the coast was occupied by the Greeks. The peninsula of Cnidus, with the land above it known as Pedasa, Bybassus, Termessus, was colonised by Dorians, as was the southern shore of the Ceramic Gulf, from Myndus to Ceramus. More to the north the coast was occupied upon by the Ionian Greeks, who seem to have possessed themselves of the entire seaboard from the Hermæus to the furthest recess of the Smyrnæan Gulf, but it cannot be retained some portions of the coast, and were able to furnish to the navy of Xerxes a fleet of seventy ships. Encyclopædia Britannica.

Caribs (kar'ibz). [From Cariba or Carina, the name which they gave to themselves, meaning "people."] A powerful and warlike tribe of Indians who, at the time of the conquest, occupied portions of Guiana and the lower Orinoco and had conquered the Windward or Caribbee islands from the Arawaks. There was little tribal union, and the authority of the chiefs was nominal. At the time of the conquest they practised agriculture. Columbus first encountered these Indians at Guadeloupe, and had a battle with them at Santa Cruz (1493). The women and children were carried away to slavery, but they were little molested, probably because they could not be forced to work. The French and English occupations of the Caribbee islands led to long wars with these Indians; the last stronghold was in St Vincent, where some of them became mixed with fugitive negro slaves, giving rise to the race called "black Caribs." After a bloody war with the English, the surviving Caribs, to the number of 5,000, were transported from St. Vincent, to the island of Roatan, near the coast of Honduras (1796). Thence they passed over to Honduras and Nicaragua, where their descendants, mostly "black Caribs," now live. A few were allowed to return to St. Vincent where they have a reservation, and a few more in other islands. Some thousands remain in a semi-wild state in Guiana and Venezuela. In French Guiana they are called Galibis. The name Caribs was applied by the Spaniards to any Indians whom they regarded as cannibals or anthropophagi (from wod cannibal or canibal, in various languages, is a corruption of Caribs).

Carlos (kär'los). Don. Born at Valladolid, Spain, July 5, 1545; died at Madrid, June 24, 1568. Eldest son of Philip II. of Spain and Maria of Portugal. He received the homage of the estates as heir-apparent in 1560. In 1567, angered by the appointment of the Duke of Alva as the governorship of the Netherlands, he struck at the duke with a poniard in the presence of the king. Having had plans to escape from Spain, he was apprehended by his father, Jan. 18, 1568, and a commission was appointed to investigate his conduct. He died in prison a few months later, his death being involved in obscurity and in mystery. Tragedies with Don Carlos as subject have been written by Otway (1672), De Campistron (1683), De Chenedollé, and Alfieri. See Don Carlos's Soliloquy.

Carlos, Don (Carlos Maria José Isidoro de Bourbon). Born March 29, 1788; died at Trieste, Austria-Hungary, March 10, 1855. A pretender to the throne of Spain, second son of Charles IV., and brother of Ferdinand VII. He was in 1808 compelled by Napoleon to renounce, with his brother, all claim to the Spanish succession, and was detained with his brother at Valençay till 1814. He became after the restoration heir presumptive to the throne, but was displaced in this position by the abolition of the Salic law through the pragmatic sanction of March 29, 1830, and by the birth of the infanta Maria Isabella, Oct. 10, 1830. On the death of Ferdinand, Sept. 29, 1833, he was proclaimed by the Absolutist party, and was recognized by the pretender Dom Miguel of Portugal. Resistance being made hopeless by the Quadruple Treaty, concluded at London, April 22, 1834, between Spain, Portugal, England, and France, for the purpose of expelling the two pretenders from the Spanish peninsula, he embarked for England June 3, 1834. He returned to Spain, however, and appeared at the headquarters of the Absolutist or Carlist insurgents in Navarre, July 10, 1834, but was forced by the capture of his army by General Espartero to seek refuge across the French border, Sept. 14, 1834. He resigned his claims to his son Don Carlos, May 18, 1845, and assumed the title of Count de Molina.

Carpocratians (kär-pō-krā'shianz). A sect of Gnostics of the 2d century, followers of Carpocrates or Carpocras of Alexandria. See the extract.

> The Carpocratians were avowed Eclectics: they worshipped, as benefactors of the human race, the images of Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, and Jesus Christ, as well as that of their own founder. By this school were received, possibly were invented, many of the astrologic or theurgic books attributed to Zoroaster and other ancient sages. The Jewish Scriptures were the works of inferior angels; of the Christian, they received only the Gospel of St. Matthew. The supreme, unknown, uncreated Deity was the Monad; the visible world was the creation, the domain of inferior beings. But the Carpocratian system was much simpler and, in some respects, rejecting generally the system of Æons or Emanations, approached much nearer to Christianity than those of most of the Gnostics.

In 1769 he went to England. He published "Travels through the Interior Parts of North America," including an account of the manners, customs, languages, etc., of the Indians (1778); "A Treatise on the Cultivation of the Tea-plant" (1779), etc.

Carvilius (kär-vil'i-us), Spurius. A Roman freedman, noted as one of the first to open a public school at Rome, and as the arranger of the Roman alphabet. See the extract.

K disappeared from use at a very early date, being represented by C instead. Later, when the need appeared for a distinction between the smooth mutes and aspirate mediæ or mutæ, the functions of Sp Carvilius (ca. 230 BC) and others, invented the sign G to designate the former, by the addition of a stroke to the figure of C. Z, necessary and little use (Y, which was only pressed together with Y to the time of Cicero), and was then placed at the end of the alphabet. Thus the alphabet of Carvilius therefore consisted of twenty-one letters.

Casas (kä'säs), Bartolomé de las. Born at Seville, 1474; died at Madrid, July, 1566. A Spanish Dominican, celebrated as a defender of the Indians against their Spanish conquerors. He went to Hispaniola in 1502 as conquered Velasquez. He was ordained a priest against the opinion of Indian slavery, and in 1517 went to Spain to plead for the Indians with Ferdinand. By Cardinal Ximenes he was named Protector of the Indians with supreme power. He returned to Hispaniola in 1520, but in 1522 came to Spain to urge his views on Charles V., who appointed him bishop of Cumana, which was declined. He was bishop of Chiapa, 1544–47, but resigned his bishopric and returned to the Dominican monastery at Seville, and finally to Spain. His views on the right of conquest are set forth in his "Historia de las Indias" (published 1875–76), and in his "Destruccion de las Indias" (1552). His works are numerous and important.

Casas Grandes (kä'säs grän'dās). [Sp., 'great houses.'] An extensive ruin in northwestern Sonora, about 120 miles south of the United States boundary line in New Mexico. The settlement appears to have been originally a rectangular inclosure, with walls about 6 feet thick. The walls are of large adobe bricks, and are from 20 to 30 feet high. Within the inclosure are the remains of numerous stone and adobe buildings, with many thick walls of the same material and of considerable size. The pottery unearthed here is of a peculiar character. The settlement was evidently built by the Indians of New Mexico, concerning whose habitations little is known except that they had reached a high degree of civilization at the time of the Spanish conquest. At least one of the buildings is a village of Moqui Indians of modern date, containing 1,000 souls. The Casas Grandes ruins are about 15 leagues south of those in eastern Mexico.

Catharine (kath'a-rin) I., or Catherine (kath'e-rin). Born at Jakobstadt, Courland, Russia, April 15, 1679 (?): died at St. Petersburg, May 27, 1727. Empress of Russia. She married Peter the Great in 1707; was acknowledged as his wife in 1712; was crowned as his empress in 1724; and reigned 1725–27. She was of obscure origin; was brought up in the family of a Protestant minister at Marienburg, named Glück; married a Swedish dragoon; fell into the hands of the Russians at the capture of Marienburg, Aug. 23, 1702; and eventually became the slave of Prince Menchikoff. In whose house she attracted the attention of Peter the Great, who made her his mistress in 1703. She rescued him, by bribing the Turkish grand vizir, in 1711, from a dangerous position on the Pruth, when with an army of 38,000 men he was surrounded by 200,000 Turks. During her reign she was led chiefly by the influence of Menchikoff. She founded the Russian Academy of Sciences, and fitted out the naval exploring expedition under Bering.

Catharine II., or Catherine. Born at Stettin, Prussia, May 2, 1729: died at St. Petersburg, Nov. 17, 1796. Empress of Russia 1762–96, daughter of the Prince of Anhalt-Zerbst. She married in 1745 the empress Elizabeth's nephew, who ascended the throne Jan. 5, 1762, as Peter III. With the assistance of her paramour Gregory Orlof, the hetman Razumovski, Count Panin, and Princess Dashkof, she brought about the deposition of Peter (who was put to death in prison), and usurped the throne in July, 1762. She participated in the partitions of Poland 1772, 1793, and 1795; concluded with the Turks the peace of Kutschuk-Kainardji, by which Russia acquired Kinburn, Azov, Yenikale, Kertch, and both Kabardas; and in 1792 signed the peace of Jassy, by which Russia acquired Oczakov and the country between the Bug and Dniester; and incorporated Courland in 1795. She improved the administration of the empire, introduced a new code of laws, encouraged art and literature. She has been called "the Semiramis of the North," and Voltaire said, with reference to her, "Light now comes from the North."

No sovereign since Ivan the Terrible had extended the frontiers of the Empire to such vast limits. She had given Russia for boundaries the Niemen, the Dniester, and the Black Sea. Rambaud, History of Russia, II. 127.

Catharine, or Catherine, of Aragon, Queen of England. Born at Alcalá de Henares, Spain, Dec. 15 or 16, 1485; died at Kimbolton, Huntingdon, England, Jan. 7, 1536. A queen of England, she was the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain; married Arthur, prince of Wales, in 1501; married Henry VIII. in 1509; and became the mother of Mary (who subsequently succeeded the throne of England) in 1516. About 1527 Henry VIII., infatuated with Anne Boleyn, began to take measures to secure a divorce; and in 1533, application having been made in vain to Rome, the marriage was declared void by Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury.

Catilina (kat-i-lī'nā), E. Catiline (kat'i-lin), Lucius Sergius. Born about 108 B. C.: killed at Pistoiæ, Italy, 62 B. C. A Roman politician and conspirator. He was of an ancient but impoverished patrician family. As a partizan of Sulla he rendered himself infamous by his complicity in the horrors of the proscription, destroying with his own hand his brother-in-law, Q. Cæcilius. He was pretor in 68, and governor of Africa in 67. After an abortive attempt, in conjunction with P. Autronius, to murder the consuls-elect for 65, with a view to seizing the fasces, and after an unsuccessful candidacy in the consular elections of 64, he organized a wide-spread conspiracy against the republic, whose object is said to have been the cancellation of debts, the proscription of the wealthy, and the distribution among the conspirators of all offices of honor and emolument. It was defeated by the vigilance and eloquence of Cicero, who was then consul. The rebellion having broken out in Etruria, Oct. 27, Cicero pronounced in the senate, Nov. 8, his first oration against Catiline, which caused the latter to leave the city. On Nov. 9 Cicero delivered in the Forum his second Catilinarian oration, in which he acquainted the people with the events in the senate and the departure of Catiline from Rome. On Dec. 3 the ringleaders of the conspiracy was obtained from the envoys of Allobroges, which had been tampered with by the Catilinarians; and in the evening Cicero delivered in the Forum his third oration, in which he acquainted the people with the events of the day and the seizure of the conspirators left in Rome. On Dec. 5 Cicero delivered in the senate his fourth oration, which was followed by the execution in prison of Lentulus, Cethegus, Statilius, and Gabinius. Meanwhile Catiline had secured command of the rebel Etrurian forces, which amounted to about two legions, but was overtaken by the army of the senate as he was attempting to escape into Gaul, and was defeated and slain in the battle which ensued.

Catiline's Conspiracies. 1. A play by Stephen Gosson, written before 1579. It was acted, but not printed.—2. A tragedy by Robert Wilson and Henry Chettle, perhaps a revised version of Gosson's play: 1598. Henslowe.

Caverne de l'Homme Mort. [F., 'cave of the dead man.'] See the extract.

For the determination of the characteristics of the human race, a quaternary race no more typical could be chosen, selected than the celebrated cavern of l'Homme Mort, the department of the Lozère. It has an ancient, vaulted dwelling, with branching corridors, and a sepulchral platform. Here the feeble human race seems to have manifested itself for a time, after the more lordly superfamilies had been destroyed by the Scandinavian glaciers whose descendants now occupy the region. In this cave some fifty persons must have been interred, and in fifteen cases the skeletons have been well preserved, so as to admit of accurate measurement, and even of the determination of the sex. Tudor, Aryans, p. 94.

It was as chief minister to Elizabeth for forty years that he won his great fame.

Cecilia (sē-sil'i-ä). A novel by Madame d'Arblay, published in 1782.

Cecilia, Saint. Died at Rome, 230. A Christian martyr. According to the legend, she was compelled, in spite of a vow of celibacy, to marry a young nobleman, Valerian. She succeeded in converting him to her views and also to Christianity, for which they suffered death. She has generally been considered the patron saint of music, particularly church music, and is represented in art as singing and playing on some musical instrument, or as listening to the music of an angel who has been drawn from heaven by her harmony. Dryden alludes to this in his "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day." Her story is also told by Chaucer in the Second Nun's Tale, one of the "Canterbury Tales." In the Roman and Anglican calendars her feast is celebrated on Nov. 22.

Cecilia, Saint. A painting by Rubens, in the Old Museum at Berlin. The saint is playing on a harpsichord and singing, attended by four angels. It is in reality a portrait of the painter's second wife, Helene Fourment.

Cecilia, Story of Saint. Five celebrated frescos by Domenichino, in San Luigi dei Francesi, Rome. The subjects are the saint distributing her clothes among the poor, her contempt for idols, her martyrdom, her reception of the martyr's crown, and her assumption. There are no better examples of Domenichino's somewhat cold and academical style.

Celestina (Sp. thā-lās-tē'nä). A Spanish prose drama in twenty-one acts, or parts, originally called "The Tragicomedy of Calisto and Melibœa." Though, from its length and structure, it can never have been represented, its dramatic spirit and movement have left traces that are not to be mistaken of their influence on the national drama ever since.

The first act, which is much the longest, was probably written by Rodrigo de Cota, of Toledo, and in that case we may safely assume that it was produced about 1480.

Tichnor, Span. Lit., I. 235.

Celestine (sel'es-tin) I., or Cœlestine (sel'es-tin), Saint. Died at Rome, 432. Bishop of Rome 422–432. He convoked the Council of Ephesus, which in 431 condemned the heresy of Nestorius, and is said by some to have sent St. Patrick to Ireland and Palladius to Scotland, although it is not clear that either of these missionaries had any connection with Rome. He is commemorated on April 6.

Celestine II., or Cœlestine (Guido di Castello). Died at Rome, March, 1144. Pope 1143–1144. He absolved Louis VII. of France.

Celestine III., or Cœlestine (Giacinto Orsini). Born about 1106; died at Rome, Jan. 8, 1198. Pope 1191–98. He crowned Henry VI. of Germany in 1191, and confirmed the Teutonic order in 1192.

Celestine IV. (Goffredo Castiglione). Died Oct. 10, 1241. Pope, elected Sept. 22, 1241. He reigned only 17 days.

Celestine V., Saint (Pietro di Murrhone). Born in central Italy about 1215; died at the castle Fumone, in the Campagna, Italy, May 19, 1296. He founded the order of the Celestines about 1254, and was elected pope, at the age of eighty, July, 1294. Being unfitted for this position by his previous life as a hermit and consequent ignorance of the world, he abdicated, Dec., 1294, and was imprisoned at Fumone by Boniface VIII., who feared that, left at liberty, he might cause a division in the church.

She masquerades with Rosalind in the forest of Arden, in the disguise of Aliena, a shepherdess.

3. A straightforward, affectionate English girl, with no squeamishness, in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "The Humorous Lieutenant," made love to by both Antiochus the king's son Demetrius. She disguises as Enanthe.—4. The wife of Corvino in Jonson's "Volpone."—5. A very young girl in Whitehead's "School for Lovers." The part was written for Mrs. Cibber, then over fifty years old.

Célimène (sā-lē-män'). 1. An artificial, coquettish, but charming and sparkling fine lady in Molière's comedy "Le Misanthrope." She makes Acaste and Clitandre both believe she loves them, but finally consents to marry the "Misanthrope," Alceste, though declining to seclude herself from the world with him, when she rejects her. Her name is applied proverbially to a coquette.

2. A character in Molière's "Les Précieuses Ridicules," who has nothing to say.

Cellamare (chel-lä-mä're), Prince of (Antonio Giudice, Prince of Cisternano). Born at Naples, 1657; died at Seville, Spain, May 16, 1733. A Spanish general and diplomatist, ambassador to France 1715–18.

Celle (tsel'le). A city in the province of Hanover, Prussia, situated on the Aller 22 miles northeast of Hannover. It has an ancient ducal castle. Population (1890), commune, 18,901.

Cellini (chel-lē'nē), Benvenuto. Born at Florence, Italy, Nov. 10, 1500; died Feb. 13, 1571. A famous Italian sculptor and worker in gold and silver. He studied with Michelangelo Bandinelli, father of the sculptor Bandinelli, and Marcone the goldsmith. He was in 1536–37 he worked in Pisa. In the latter year he returned to Florence, where he met Torregiano (see Torrigiano), who tried to secure him for his work in England. Benvenuto's loyalty to Michelangelo, however, prevented the engagement. From 1523–40 he was in Rome, occupied entirely with his work as goldsmith. In May, 1527, occurred the siege and sack of Rome by the troops of the Constable de Bourbon; in which Cellini assisted in the defense of the Castle of St. Angelo, and claimed to have killed Bourbon and wounded the Prince of Orange. At the instigation of Pier Luigi Farnese, bastard of Paul III., he was imprisoned in the Castle of St. Angelo, Oct., 1538. The account of his escape Dec., 1539, is the greatest marvel of his marvelous autobiography. From 1540–44 he sojourned in France at the court of Francis I. He had his atelier in the Petit Nesle (see Petit Nesle). At this time his first attempts at sculpture were made—the chief being the Nymph of Fontainebleau. From 1544 to his death in 1471 he served Cosimo I. and the Medici family at Florence. His study of the casting of the Petseus and the Loggia dei Lanzi at this time has played a great rôle in literature. His autobiography, one of the most famous of Italian classics, circulated in MS. until it was printed in 1730. It was translated into German by Goethe. The latest English translation is by J. A. Symonds.

Celman, Miguel Juarez. See Juarez Celman.

Celsius (sel'si-us or sel'shius), Anders. Born at Upsala, Nov. 27, 1701; died at Upsala, April 25, 1744. A Swedish astronomer, nephew of Olaf Celsius, professor of astronomy at Upsala. He introduced, about 1742, the centigrade or Celsius thermometer.

Celsius, Olaf. Born July 19, 1670; died at Upsala, Sweden, June 24, 1756. A Swedish botanist, uncle of Anders Celsius. He was professor of theology and oriental languages in the University of Upsala, and rendered himself famous by his researches in regard to the plants mentioned in the Scriptures. He was the instructor of Linnæus.

Celsius, Olaf. Born at Upsala, Sweden, Dec. 15, 1716; died at Lund, Sweden, Feb. 15, 1794. A Swedish historian, son of Olaf Celsius (1670–1756). He became professor of history in the University of Upsala in 1747, and bishop of Lund in 1777. He wrote a history of Gustavus I. (1746–53), and a history of Line (MV.) (1775–94), published in 1796.

Celsus (sel'sus). Lived in the 2d (?) century A. D. A Platonist philosopher. He was the author of a famous treatise against Christianity, Λογος Αληθης (The true discourse), fragments of which is preserved in the "Contra Celsum" by Origen.

Celsus, Aulus (or Aurelius) Cornelius. Lived in the first half of the 1st century A. D. A Roman writer, author of a comprehensive encyclopedia treating of farming, medicine, military art, oratory, jurisprudence, and philosophy. Of this only the eight books de medicina have come down to us, being b. 6–13 of the complete work, the only one of this kind in the good age of Roman literature. In those Celsus gives an account of the whole medical system of the time, and writing as a layman and following chiefly Hippokrates and Asklepiades, with sound judgment and in simple, pure diction. The parts dealing with surgery are especially valuable next to these the diagnosis of internal maladies." Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Wagn. II. 22.

Celsus, or Cellach (kel'läch). Saint. Born 1079; died Archbishop of Armagh, Munster, Ireland, April 1, 1129. An Irish ecclesiastic, archbishop of Armagh after 1104.

Celtiberi. See Celtiberes.

Celtiberia (sel-ti-bē'ri-ä). [From the Celtiberes. See the def.] In ancient geography, a region in Spain corresponding to the modern south-western Aragon and the greater part of Soria, Cuenca, and Burgos. It was extended applied to a peninsula united with Hispania Citerior. The Celtiberi (Celtiberians) were thought to be a mixture of the indigenous Iberians and invading Celts from Gaul (whence their name). They offered a vigorous resistance to Rome and were finally subdued after B. C. 72. Among their chief towns were Numantia and Segobriga.

Celtica (sel'ti-kä). The central division of Transalpine Gaul, according to the threefold division of the Gauls by Julius Cæsar (Gauls or Celts, Aquitanians, Belgians). It connected with the province of Narbonne, except that it extended southwestward to the Garonne.

Celts, or Kelts (selts, kelts). [L. Celtæ, from Gr. Κελται, a name at first vaguely applied to a Western people, afterward the regular designation of the Celtic races. Origin unknown.] The peoples which speak languages akin to those of Wales, Ireland, the Highlands of Scotland, and Brittany, and constitute a branch or principal division of the Indo-European families. Formerly these peoples occupied partly or wholly France, Spain, northern Italy, the western parts of Germany, and the British islands. Of the remaining Celtic languages and peoples there are two chief divisions, viz. the Gaidhelic, comprising the Highlanders of Scotland, the Irish, and the Manx, and the Cymric, comprising the Welsh and Bretons; the Cornish, of Cornwall, related to the latter, is only recently extinct.

Amalgamation of race has since been effected to a certain extent, but still in many parts of Wales, Scotland, and Ireland the mass of the population is mainly or entirely celtic. Four cities dialects — the Manx, the Gaelic, the Erse, and the Welsh — are spoken in our country, and the four Celtic type stands alike in the Brethons, the Welsh, the native Irish, the people of the Isle of Man, and the Scottish Highlanders, of whom the two former represent the Cimbric, and the three latter the non-Gothic branch of the nation. Raulinson, Herod., III. 186.

The Celts appear to have crossed to Britain from Belgic Gaul. In the neolithic age a race indistinguishable from that of the British round barrows occupied Belgium.

Cemetery Ridge. A low ridge near Gettysburg, celebrated in the battle of that name.

Cempoala (thām-pō-ä'lä). An ancient town of the Totonac Indians of Mexico, not far from the present site of Vera Cruz, and a little back from the coast. It is described as a city of 23,000 inhabitants, with many palaces and temples; but these accounts are probably exaggerated. In 1519 the Cempoalans gave Cortes a friendly reception, and Gonçi, a Roman nobleman, and Ersilia Santa-Croce. Her father, a dissipated and passionate man, treated his family with such severity that his second wife Lucrezia Petroni, his eldest son, Cenci Beatrice and the two younger sons Bernardo and Paolo, procured his murder at the palace of Petrella in the kingdom of Naples, Sept. 9, 1598. For this crime Lucrezia, Giacomo, and Beatrice were executed at Rome, Sept. 11, 1599, and Bernardo was condemned to the galleys for life, being, however, pardoned March 29, 1606. Paolo died shortly after the murder. At the trial Beatrice's counsel, in order to justify the murder, accused Francesco, apparently without foundation, of having attempted the commission of incest upon his daughter, which has placed her in the light of a martyr. He disappeared and her patrician birth have made her a favorite theme in poetry and art. She has been made the subject of a drama by Shelley, of a novel (1820), and of a painting by Guido Reni, in the Barberini palace, Rome.

Ceneda. See Vittorio.

Cenimagni (sen-i-mag'ni). [L. (Cæsar).] A Celtic people located by Cæsar in the eastern coast-region of Britain, north of the Thames.

Cenis, Mont. See Mont Cenis.

Cenomani (sen-o-mā'ni). [L. (Cæsar) Cenomani, Gr. (Polybius) Κενωμανοι.] A Celtic people, a part of the army of Belloveesus, who with his same then crossed the Alps under a legendary leader. Etitovius, and settled north of the Po about Brescia and Verona according to the detailed account of Livy. They were a branch of the Aulerci, and their seat in Gaul, where they were called Aulerci Cenomani, was on the Sarthe near Le Mans. The Aulerci were included among the tribes consulting the Amarici.

Centaur. See Centaurus.

Centaurus (sen-tä'rus). [L., 'the Centaur.'] An ancient southern constellation, situated between Argo and Scorpio, pictured to represent a centaur holding a Bacchic wand. Its brightest star, a Centauri, is the third brightest in the heavens, being exceeded only by Sirius and Canopus. It is of a reddish color. Its second star, β, a white star, is about as bright as Betelgeuze, and is ranked as the eleventh star in magnitude in order of brightness. The two stars are situated near each other on the parallel of 60° south, a little east of the southern Cross. Centaurus has, besides, two stars of the second magnitude, and seven of the third, in the splendid constellation.

Centla (sant'la). An ancient town situated near the present Frontera, in Tabasco, southern Mexico: scene of the first victory of Cortés, 1519.

Centlivre (sent-liv'er or sent-liv'ver), Susannah. Born in Ireland (?), of English parents, about 1667; died at London, Dec. 1, 1723. An English actress and dramatist. She is said to have been the daughter of a Mr. Freeman, of Lincolnshire, who removed to Ireland shortly before her birth. About 1706 she married Joseph Centlivre, chief cook to Queen Anne and George I. Among her numerous plays are "The Platonic Lady" (acted 1706.) The Busy Body" (acted 1709), "Gotham Election" (published 1715; 2d ed. 1737 entitled "Humours of Elections"), "A Bold Stroke for a Wife" (acted 1718).

Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles (soñ nō-vel' nō-vel'). [F., 'one hundred new tales.'] An old French collection of tales, first printed in folio, by Vérard, without date, from a manuscript of the year 1456. Dunlop.

The Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles are to all intents and purposes prose fabliaux. They have the full licence of that class of composition, its sparkling fun, its truth to low-class life, and its coarse jumping fare. Many of them are taken from the work of the Italian novelists, but all are handled in a thoroughly original manner. The style is perhaps the best of the late medieval prose works, being clear, precise, and definite without the least appearance of baldness or dryness.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 148.

Cento (chen'tō). A town in the province of Ferrara, Italy, situated near the Reno 17 miles north of Bologna. Population, 9,000.

Centoat (then-tō-ät'). In Mexican (Nahuatl) mythology, the goddess (according to some authorities a god) of maize, and consequently of agriculture. Her principal feast was in the fourth Mexican month (April–May), and she was also honored in the eleventh month (Sept.). She was one of the patrons of chinbanath. The offerings made to her were generally grain and fruits. Some authorities identify this goddess with Chicomecoatl Tzinteotl, etc. Also written Cintéotl, Cintéotl, Centeotl, Taylor, Aryans, p. 81.

Centones Homerici (sen-tō'nēz hō-mer'i-sī). See the extract.

Even the life of Christ was put together in Homeric hexameters, called Centones Homerici, which were attributed to the Empress Eudocia, and thought worthy of being printed by Aldus (1501), and Stephens (1568), but apparently as Christian literature.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 163.

Cento Novelle Antiche (chen'tō nō-vel'le än-tē'ke). [It., 'one hundred old tales.'] A collection of tales from ancient and medieval history, the romances of chivalry, and the fabliaux of the trouvères, made in Italy about the end of the 13th century.

Centorbi. See Centuripe.

Central America. A name applied collectively to the five republics of Guatemala, Honduras, Salvador, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica: they formed a federal republic 1825–39. In a more extended sense, and especially in natural history, the name includes all the continent from the Isthmus of Panama nearly to the boundary of the United States.

Central India Agency. The official name for a collection of native states in India, under the control of Great Britain, situated between Rajputana and the Northwestern Provinces on the north, and the Central Provinces on the south. Chief states, Gwalior, Indur, Bhopal, Rewa. Area, 77,808 square miles. Population 1891, 10,358,812.

Centralists (sen'tral-ists). [Sp. Centralistas.] A political party in Mexico which began in 1823, was reorganized in 1837, and has ever since been prominent. The Centralists favored a single centralized republican government, and are opposed by the Federalists, who desire autonomy of the states. The struggles for the supremacy of these two parties have caused most of the civil wars which have desolated Mexico. Temporarily each of the parties or branches of them have been known by other names. Santa Anna was long the leading spirit of the Centralists. Centralist and Federalist parties have been prominent in the affairs of other Spanish-American countries, notably Argentina, Venezuela, and Central America, but they are commonly distinguished by other names.

Central Park. The principal park in New York, extending from 59th street to 110th street, and from Fifth avenue to Eighth avenue. It was designed by Olmsted and Vaux, and contains numerous drives, the Mall, the Croton Reservoirs, Cleopatra's Needle (the Obelisk), the Metropolitan Art Museum, etc. Length, 2½ miles. Area, 840 acres.

Central Provinces. A chief-commissionership of British India, lat. 18°–24° N., long. 77°–84° E. It contains four divisions, Nagpur, Jabalpur, Nerbudda, and Chattisgarh. Its chief town is Nagpur. Area, 86,501 square miles. Population, 1891, 11,548,020. Connected with the Central Provinces are 15 vassal states: Bastar, Kanta, Patna, etc. Area, 29,435 square miles. Population (1891), 2,109,611.

Centuripe (chen-tō'ri-pe), or Centorbi (chen-tor'bē). A town in the province of Catania, Sicily, 20 miles northwest of Catania: the ancient Centuripæ. It has Roman antiquities. It was destroyed by the emperor Frederick II. in 1233. Population, 9,000.

Century White. A nickname given to John White (1590–1645), from his work "First Century of Scandalous Malignant Priests, etc."

Cenû (sā-nō'). The name given about 1515 to a region on the northern coast of South America, about midway between Darien and Cartagena. Ensise, sent from Darien to conquer it (1515), tried to treat with the Indians, but attacked aroused their enmity. A second expedition, sent soon after, under Becerra, was entirely destroyed by the natives.

Ceos (sē'os), or Cea (sē'ä). [Gr. Κεως or Κεα.] An island of the Cyclades, situated in the Ægean Sea 13 miles southeast of Attica: the modern Zea, or Tzia. It contained four cities, and was the birthplace of Simonides and Bacchylides. It belongs to Greece.

Ceos. The capital of the island of Ceos.

Cepeda (thā-pā'thä), Diego. Born at Tordesillas about 1480; died at Valladolid, 1549 or 1550. A Spanish judge. He was one of the Canary Islands, and subsequently one of the royal audience which accompanied the viceroy Blasco Nuñez Vela to Peru (1544). There he led the judges in their opposition to Vela, imprisoned him, joined Gonzalo Pizarro, and took part in the battle of Anquitite, where the viceroy was killed (Jan. 18, 1546). Foreseeing Pizarros defeat, he absolved him on the battle-field (9 Sept. 1548). Cepeda was sent to be tried in Spain, and at sea died, poisoned himself in prison.

Cephalonia (sef-a-lō'ni-ä), ancient Cephallenia (sef-a-lē'ni-ä), modern Gr. Kephallenia. (Gr. Κεφαλληνια, Κεφαλληνια νησος.) One of the Ionian Islands, west of Greece, forming with Ithaca and neighboring small islands a nomarchy of Greece. Its surface is mountainous. Its capital is Argostoli. The island was called by Homer Same or Samos. It became subject to Rome in 189 B. C., and later came under Byzantine, Venetian, and Turkish rule, and a British protectorate. Area, 302 square miles. Length, 30 miles. Population, 1890, 80,478.

Cephalus (sef'a-lus). [Gr. Κεφαλος.] In Greek mythology, the son of Deion and Diomede, and the husband of Procris or Procne whom he accidentally slew while hunting.

Cephas (sē'fas). [Aram., 'a rock'; Gr. Κηφᾶς.] A surname given by Christ to Simon: rendered in Greek Πέτρος ('a rock'), in Latin Petrus, and in English Peter.

Cepheus (sē'fūs). [Gr. Κηφεύς.] 1. A king of Ethiopia, son of Belus, husband of Cassiopeia, and father of Andromeda.—2. One of the Argonauts.

Cepheus. One of the ancient northern constellations, preceding Cassiopeia. It is figured to represent the Ethiopian king Cepheus wearing a tiara and having his arms somewhat extended. Its brightest stars are of the third magnitude.

Cephissus (sē-fis'us). [Gr. Κηφισσός.] In ancient geography: (a) A river in Phocis and Bœotia, Greece, flowing into Lake Copais (Topolias). (b) A river in Attica, Greece, flowing through the plain of Athens into the Saronic Gulf. (c) A river of Attica, Greece, flowing through the plain of Eleusis into the Gulf of Eleusis.

Ceracchi (chä-rä'kē). Giuseppe. Born in Corsica about 1760: executed at Paris, Jan. 30 (?), 1801. An Italian sculptor, conspirator against the life of Napoleon 1800.

Ceram (se-ram'; Pg. pron. se-rän'), or Seram, or Serang, or Ceiram (Pg. pron. sā-rāū'). An island of the Moluccas, East Indies, lat. 3°–3° 30′ S., long. 128°–131° E. Its inhabitants are Malays and Alfuras. It is under Dutch sovereignty. Area, 6,605 square miles. Population, about 100,000.

Ceramicus (ser-a-mī'kus). [Gr. Κεραμεικός.] A large area on the northwest side of ancient Athens: so named from the early gathering in it of the potters, who still adhere to it, attracted by the presence of water and excellent clay. It was divided into two parts: the Inner Ceramicus, within the walls, traversed by the Dromos street from the Dipylon Gate, and including the Agora; and the Outer Ceramicus, continuing the first division outside of the walls. The Outer Ceramicus became a favorite place of burial for the Athenians, and here were interred those honored with a public funeral. The funeral rites celebrated on one of the various roads which radiated from the Dipylon Gate. Little trace of them remains, except of the mingle group upon each of the inscriptions of the Sacred Way to Eleusis: a group which was preserved by being buried in sea-sand, in the siege-agger of Sulla, and contains historical and plastic memorials of very high value, among them the sculptured monument of Dexileos, who fell before Corinth in 393 B. C., and tombs of Lysitheos, Hegeso, Aristion, Demetria, and Pamphile.

Ceraunian Mountains (se-ra'ni-an moun'tānz). [Gr. Κεραύνια ὄρη; L. Ceraunii montes.] In ancient geography: (a) a range of mountains in the eastern part of the Caucasus system: exact position undetermined. (b) A chain of mountains in northwestern Epirus, terminating in the promontory Acroceraunia (which see).

Cerberus (ser'be-rus). [Gr. Κέρβερος.] In Greek mythology, the watch-dog at the entrance to the infernal regions, offspring of Typhœus and Echidna: usually represented with three heads, a serpent's tail, and a mane of serpents' heads.

Cercinitis (sėr-si-nī'tis). [Gr. Κερκινῖτις λίμνη.] In ancient geography, the lake or enlargement of the river Strymon (in Macedonia), near its mouth: the modern Takines.

Cercops (ser'kops). [Gr. Κέρκωψ.] 1. An ancient Greek Orphic poet, said to have been the author of a poem, "The Descent into Hades," also attributed to Prodicus of Samos and others. —2. A Greek poet of Miletus, a contemporary of Hesiod. To him a poem on the war of Ædmius, king of the Dorians, against the Lapithæ (also attributed to Hesiod), by some is assigned.

Cerda (ther'thä), Tomás Antonio Manrique de la, Count of Paredes and Marquis of La Laguna. Born about 1620: died 1688. A Spanish administrator. He was a member of the royal council, and from 1681 to 1686 was viceroy of New Spain (Mexico). During his term the buccaneers sacked Vera Cruz (May, 1683), and committed other ravages.

Cerda Sandoval Silva y Mendoza, Gaspar de la. Born about 1653: died 1697. A Spanish administrator. In 1688 he was created count of Galve and made viceroy of Mexico, holding the office from Nov., 1688, to July, 1696. He sent expeditions against the French of Santo Domingo and Louisiana, 1690–91, and in 1694 Pensacola, Florida, was founded by his orders. He returned to Spain in May, 1696.

Cerdagne (ser-dänÿ'), Sp. La Cerdaña (ther-thän'ÿa). An ancient countship on both sides of the eastern Pyrenees. Part of it is now in the department of Pyrénées-Orientales in France, and part is in Spain. It followed in the later middle ages the fortunes of Catalonia, and then of Aragon. It was released from homage to France in 1258, was acquired by France in 1462, and was restored to Aragon in 1493. The part to the north of the Pyrenees was ceded to France in 1659.

Cerdic (ker'dik). Died 534. A Saxon calchorman who founded a settlement on the coast of Hampshire, England, in 495 A. D., assumed the title of King of the West Saxons in 519, and became ancestor of the English royal line. He defeated the Britons at Charford in 519; was himself defeated at Mount Badon, or Badbury, in Dorsetshire, in 520; and conquered the Isle of Wight in 530.

Cerdicesford (kėr'diks-fōrd). The scene of the victory of Cerdic and Cymric over the Britons in 519: usually identified with Charford (which see).

Cerdo (sėr'dō). Born in Syria: lived about 137 A. D. A Gnostic teacher, founder of a sect named from him Cerdonians (which see).

Cerdonians (sėr-dō'ni-anz). A Gnostic sect of the 2d century, named from its founder Cerdo. They held that there were two first causes, one good (the unknown father of Jesus Christ) and one evil (the Creator revealed in the law and the prophets), and that one was not subject or inferior to the other.

Ceres (sē'rez). 1. In old Italian mythology, the goddess of grain and harvest, later identified by the Romans with the Greek Demeter. See Demeter.—2. An asteroid (No. 1) discovered by Piazzi at Palermo Jan. 1, 1801.

Ceres. An antique statue in black and white marble, in the Glyptothek at Munich. The head, arms, and feet are white; the very thin draperies are in polished black marble.

Céret (sā-ret'). A town in the department of Pyrénées-Orientales, France, situated on the Tech 17 miles southwest of Perpignan. It was the scene of a Spanish victory over the French April 20, 1793, and of a French victory over the Spanish April 30, 1794. Population (1891), commune, 2,825.

Ceridwen. In Welsh fairy lore, a deity, degraded into a sorceress, who presides over a mystical cauldron, and has a fight in which she and her foe assume different shapes at pleasure.

Cerignola (chä-rēn-yō'lä). A town in the province of Foggia, Italy, in lat. 41° 16′ N., long. 15° 53′ E. Here, April 28, 1503, the Spanish army (about 6,300) under Gonsalvo de Cordova defeated the French (6,000) under the Duc de Nemours. Loss of French, 3,000–4,000. Population, 22,000.

Cerigo (cher-ē'gō), modern Gr. Kytherion. One of the Ionian islands, situated 8–10 miles south of Laconia, Greece; the ancient Cythera. It contained a shrine of Aphrodite. Area, 107 square miles.

Cerimon (ser'i-mon). A physician of Ephesus who saves the life of Thaisa, in Shakspere's "Pericles."

Cerinthians (sē-rin'thi-anz). A sect of early heretics, followers of Cerinthus.

Cerinthus (sē-rin'thus). Born in Egypt: lived probably in the latter part of the 1st century A. D. A Gnostic teacher, founder of the heretical sect of the Cerinthians or Merinthians.

> Cerinthus was the first, of whose tenets we have any distinct statement, who, admitting the truth of Christianity, attempted to incorporate with it foreign and Oriental views. He was a native of Jewish birth, and educated in the Judæo-Platonic school of Alexandria. His system was a singular and apparently incongruous fusion of Jewish, Christian, and Oriental notions. He did with like Simon or Menander, invest himself in a sacred and mysterious character, though he pretended to angelic revelations. Like all the Orientals, his imagination was tainted with the notion of the malignity of matter; and his object seems to have been to keep both the primal Being and the Christ unmixed with its contagion. The Creator of the material world, therefore, was a secondary being, an angel or angels; as Corinthus seems to have adhered to the Jewish, and did not adopt the Oriental Language. Mahaun, Hist. of Christianity, II. 59.

Cérisoles (sā-rē-zōl'), It. Ceresole (cher-e-zō'le). A village in Piedmont, Italy, 13 miles southwest of Alba. Here, April 14, 1544, the French under the Duc d'Enghien defeated the Imperialists and Spaniards under the Marquis of Guasto. Loss of the Imperialist army, about 15,000.

Cerna (ther'nä). Vicente. A Guatemalan general. He was elected president of Guatemala, assuming the office May 24, 1865; was reelected in 1869, and held the office until June 29, 1871, when he was defeated and overthrown by Barrios.

Cerne (sėr'ne). In ancient geography, an island west of Africa, discovered and colonized by the Carthaginian Hanno: perhaps the modern Arguin.

Cerqueira e Silva, Ignacio Accioli de. See Accioli.

Cerro de Pasco (ther'rō dā pās'kō), or Pasco. The capital of the department of Junin, Peru, in lat. 10° 40′ S., long. 75° 40′ W.: 14,280 feet above the sea. It owes its existence to the celebrated silver-mines of the vicinity, long the most productive in the world, and still very rich. Population (1889), about 13,000.

Cerro Gordo (ser'rō gor'dō; Sp. pron. thär'rō gōr'dō). [Sp., 'big mountain.'] A pass by the side of the Rio del Plan, between Vera Cruz and Jalapa, state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, through which passes the principal road from the coast to Mexico by Jalapa. The pass was carried by the American forces, after a severe battle, April 18, 1847.

Cerro Largo (ther'rō lär'gō). [Sp., 'wide mountain.'] A department in northeastern Uruguay. Capital, Melo. Area, 5,840 square miles. Population (1891), about 28,000.

Certaldo (cher-tal'dō). A town in the province of Florence, Italy, 17 miles southwest of Florence. It is the place of the birth and death of Boccaccio.

Certosa (cher-tō'sä). [It., 'Carthusian Monastery.'] A former Carthusian monastery at Pavia, Italy, one of the largest and most splendid existing. The great church was founded in 1396, and is most picturesque, with its central pyramidal dome in recessed stages, its many arched and pinnacled turrets, its semicircular apses, and its beautiful arcaded galleries beneath the roofs. The rich west front is a unique achievement of the Italian Renaissance. The interior is architecturally defective, but is splendid with painting and church furniture, and contains the splendid tomb of Gian Galeazzo Visconti. The small and great cloisters are superb examples of brickwork with terra-cotta ornament.

Cervantes Saavedra (sėr-van'tēz; Sp. pron. ther-vän'tes sä-ä-vä'drä), Miguel de. Born at Alcalá de Henares, about 20 miles from Madrid, Oct. 9 (?), 1547: died at Madrid, April 23, 1616. A celebrated Spanish poet and novelist. His parents were poor, but of a noble family. It is conjectured that he was educated at Alcalá and at the University of Salamanca; little is known of his early years, however, except that he wrote verses when very young. In 1570 he served as chamberlain in the household of Monsieur Aquaviva (who was afterward cardinal) in Rome. He soon left Rome and volunteered as a common soldier in the expedition commanded by Don John of Austria and organized by the Pope and the state of Venice against the Turks. In 1571 he was severely wounded at the battle of Lepanto, losing the use of his left hand by a gun-shot wound. He was honorably discharged in 1575. He was captured in returning to Spain and passed five years in slavery in Algiers, but was finally ransomed by his family and by religious charity in 1580. Being depressed by adversity and without means or friends, he prostituted and served in Portugal and the Azores. In 1584 he had returned and was married. After this he lived much at Madrid, where he began to earn his living by authorship, at first by writing plays. In 1585 he went to Seville, where he lived, with some interruptions, for about 1598. Here he was extremely poor, and was even imprisoned as being indebted to the government. After this there is a tradition that he was sent by the grand master of the Order of La Mancha to collect rents due the monastery in Argamasilla. The debtors persecuted and imprisoned him, and it is said that here, in indignation and in prison, he began to write "Don Quixote." In 1603 he went to Valladolid, where he lived poorly as a sort of general agent and amanuensis. Here he prepared the first part of "Don Quixote" for the press, and printed it at Madrid in 1605; here he returned in 1606. In 1615 he published the second part of "Don Quixote." There was then a difference between the English calendar and the Spanish of ten days; hence he did not, as has been asserted, die on the same day with Shakspere (though on the same date). His chief work is "Don Quixote" (1605 and 1615). Among his other works are "Galatea, an Eclogue" (1584), "Novelas Exemplares" ("Twelve Instructive or Moral Tales," 1613), and "Viage del Parnaso" ("Journey to Parnassus," 1614). Perhaps Persiles y Sigismunda, a Northern Romance," was published by his widow in 1617. He wrote "twenty or thirty plays" according to his own account, some of which are preserved; but his genius did not lie in that direction. See Don Quixote.

Chæreas and Callirrhoe (kē'rē-as and ka-lir'ō-ē). An old Greek romance by Chariton Aphrodisiensis, only a part of which is extant.

Chariton of Aphrodisias is the feigned name of the erotic novelist to whom we owe the romance of Chæreas and Callirrhoe. He pretends to have been the secretary of Athenagoras, who is mentioned by Thucydides as a Syracusan orator, He composed his romance when the daughter of the latter is the heroine of the piece. The romance is less known by its merits than by the very elaborate commentary of Eustathius made in the vehicle and excuse. The age of the author is not ascertained, but it seems to us, from internal evidence, that it belongs to the same school as the romance of Achilles Tatius, and was perhaps written in the 3d or 4th century. The tale, with happier results than that of Juliet, and the usual intervention of robbers.

K. O. Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, III. 360. (Donaldson.)

Chæronea (ker-ō-nē'ä), or Chæroneia (ker-ō-nē'yä). [Gr. Χαιρώνεια.] In ancient geography, a town in western Bœotia, Greece, in lat. 38° 29′ N., long. 22° 50′ E. It was the birthplace of Plutarch. Here, 338 B. C., Philip of Macedon defeated the Bœotians and Athenians, and in 86 B. C. Sulla, with 30,000–40,000 men, defeated the army of Mithridates (about 110,000) under Archelaus.

Chaitanya (chī-tan'yu). Born at Nadiya, in Bengal, 1485; died 1527. The founder of a sect of Vaishnavas as found in Bengal. His first principle was that all the faithful worshipers of Krishna (Vishnu) were to be treated as equals. Caste was of no value estimated by faith in Krishna. "The mercy of God," said Chaitanya, 'regards neither tribe nor family." While the Vedic hymns and Brahmanas rely on works (karma), and the Upanishads on absorption, meditation and divine knowledge, as the path to blessedness, Chaitanya found it in intense devotion, displayed by complete union of the spirit with Krishna. He disappeared mysteriously in 1527, at the age of forty-two. His followers came to regard him as Krishna incarnate, and his disciples Advaita and Nityananda as manifestations of portions of the same deity. These three leaders are therefore called the three great lords (Prabhus). They form the triad of this phase of Vaishnavism.

Chaka (chä'kä). See Zulu.

Chalcedon (kal-sē'don). [Gr. Χαλκηδών.] In ancient geography, a town in Bithynia, situated on the Bosporus opposite Byzantium. It was founded by Megarian colonists about 685 B. C. The fourth ecumenical council, at which Eutychianism was condemned, was held there in 451 A. D. It was convoked by the emperor Marcianus, and was attended by 630 bishops (mostly from the Orient), the legates of Pope Leo I., and the commissioners of the emperor. It assembled originally at Nicæa in Sept., 451, but was on account of its turbulence transferred to Chalcedon in order that the imperial court and senate might attend its sessions. It condemned the Robber Council (Eutychian) of Ephesus (449), and adopted an orthodox confession of faith.

Chalkedon was called the city of the blind, because its founders passed by the then unoccupied site of Byzantium. Freeman, Hist. Essays, III. 277.

Chalcidius (kal-sid'i-us). Lived in the 6th (or 4th?) century A. D. A Platonic philosopher, author of a Latin translation of and commentary on the first part of Plato's "Timæus."

Chalcis (kal'sis). [Gr. Χαλκίς.] The chief town of Eubœa, Greece, situated on the Euripus 34 miles north of Athens: the modern Egripo, or Negropont. It was subdued by Athens in 506 B. C., and was an important trading and colonizing center. Population (1889), commune, 15,713.

Chalcis had been one of the most important cities in Greece. It was said to have been originally a colony from Athens (Strabo, x. p. 61); but shortly acquired complete independence. In a war which it had maintained with Eretria, some considerable time before this, all Greece had been concerned on the one side or the other (Herod. v. 15, and infra, ch. 99). Few cities sent out so many or such distant colonies. The whole peninsula situated between the Thermaic and Strymonic gulfs acquired the name of Chalcidice, from the number of Chalcidean settlements (Thucyd. passim). Scione, Potidæa, and others of the Cyclades, were Chalcidean (8 Ann. Christ. 5; 5 Ann. Vol. Italy and St. 3). Rhegium and Chalcis exceeded in number those of any other state. Naxos, Leontini, Catana, Zancle, Rhegium, and Cuma were among them. Smith's Dict. Antiquities, Introduction, Period, III. 375, note.

Chalco (chäl'kō). A village of Mexico, on the east side of Lake Chalco, about 15 miles southwest of Mexico City. Before the Spanish conquest Chalco was one of the most important pueblos of the Mexican valley.

Chapu (chă-pō' or shă-pō'). A seaport in the province of Che-Kiang, China, situated on the estuary of the Tsien-tang 95 miles northwest of Ningpo: the port of Hang-chow. It has an important trade, especially with Japan. The heights were stormed by the British, May 18, 1842.

Chapultepec (chă-pōl-te-pek'). [Nahuatl, "hill of the grasshoppers."] A rocky eminence about 3 miles southwest of the city of Mexico. About 1245, when it was surrounded by swamps, it was occupied by the Aztecs, and subsequently an aqueduct from the hill furnished water to Mexico. It is said by some historians that the Aztec monarchs had a summer residence at Chapultepec, but this has been denied by recent investigators. Like all places strong in position and in natural resources, it was the site of some kind of worship, but no buildings of any kind were erected there previous to the 16th century. At the foot of the hill and in the park there are some interesting vestiges of rock-carvings, which date from the first decennium of the 16th century. About 1780 the viceroy of Mexico, Galvez, began the erection of a palace on the Chapultepec hill. This was made in the form of a fort or castle, and was, in fact, intended for a stronghold as well as a summer residence. The building remained unfinished until after the revolution. Under the republic a portion was used for a military school, and the National Astronomical Observatory was erected on the hill. During the war with the United States the castle was stormed by General Pillow, Sept. 13, 1847. The emperor Maximilian made Chapultepec his principal palace, and it is now occupied as a summer residence of the president, portions being still reserved for the military school and observatory. The hill is surrounded by a beautiful park, a favorite resort of the Mexicans.

Chara (kā'rä). [L.] Properly, the name of the southern of the two dogs in the constellation Canes Venatici, but also the proper name of the fourth magnitude star α Canum.

Chares, Born at Lindus, Rhodes: lived about 290–280 B. C. A Rhodian sculptor, a pupil of Lysippus (see Lysippus), and sculptor of the Colossus of Rhodes: the founder of the Rhodian school. The colossus of Rhodes was made to commemorate the successful defense of that place against Demetrius Poliorcetes in 305 B. C. It required 12 years for its completion, and cost 300 talents. It was probably finished before 280 B. C. It represented the Rhodian sungod, Helios; was over 105 feet high; and was considered one of the seven wonders of the old world. It endured 56 years. Its artistic qualities are unknown. It is said to have been made from the engines of war which Demetrius was obliged to abandon.

Charette de la Contrie (shä-ret' dē lä kōn-trē'), François Athanase. Born at Couffé, Loire-Inférieure, France, April 21, 1763; died at Nantes, France, March 29, 1796. A leader of the Vendean insurgents against the French republic. He placed himself at the head of a force of insurgents in 1793; gained a number of victories over the republicans 1793–94; signed a treaty of peace, Feb. 15, 1795, which he soon violated; suffered a decisive defeat at St. Cyr, March 25, 1796; and, being taken prisoner shortly after, was executed at Nantes.

Charing Cross (chär'ing krōs). A cross in memory of Queen Eleanor, erected by Edward I., 1½ miles west-southwest of St. Paul's, London. It was demolished by the long Parliament in 1647, and restored by the south Eastern Railway company in 1865. It was long northward to join her husband in Scotland, having accompanied his corpse from Hardeby near Grantham in Lincolnshire, and died there Nov. 28, 1290. Edward I. followed her corpse in person during a thirteen days' progress from Grantham to Westminster Abbey; and wherever the royal hearse rested, at the close of each stage, a memorial cross was erected. Thirteen of these monuments once existed: those of Northampton and Waltham still remain.

Charioteer or Wagoner, The. See Auriga.

Charis (kā'ris). [Gr. Χάρις, L. Gratia, E. Grace.] In Greek mythology, the personification of grace and beauty: also regarded as a triad, the three Charites. See Graces.

In the Iliad Charis is the name given to the spouse of Hephæstus (qv.) in the odyssey, according to a certain portion of it, it is Aglaia. Modern Greek usage in the latter poem to have multiplied into Charites (known also to the Iliad, 265), and these have further subsided into brahmanic Apsarasæ and Gandharvæ. It would therefore appear that Hephæstus in the Iliad had married one who was the landmaid to his oldyssean wife, and Charites thought the relation was an awkward one. — Goddess, Names of the, p. 54.

Charisi (chä-rē'sē). Judah ben Solomon. A Jewish poet who lived in the 13th century in Spain. Among his works most known are his 50 Makamat under the title of "Tachkemoni ("Wisdom Town"), of Hebrew counterpart to the Arabic poems of Hariri.

Charlemagne (chär'le-mān; F. pron. shärl-mańy'), or Charles the Great, G. Karl der Grosse, L. Carlo Magno, Magnus, Carolus Magnus.] Born at Liège (Ingelheim, Aachen(?), Salzburg, Bavaria(?)), April 2, 742 or 747; died at Aachen, Germany, Jan. 28, 814. A great king of the Franks and emperor of the Romans. He was the son of Pepin the Short, king of the Franks, on whose death in 768 he succeeded to the throne jointly with his brother Karlman. He usurped the entire government on the death of the latter in 771. In 772 he began a war against the Saxons, which lasted with short intervals were the storming of Eresburg, the destruction of the Irmensul, the May-field at Paderborn (777), and the submission of the Saxon leader Wittekind (785), and which resulted in 804 in the complete subjugation and Christianization of Saxony. In 773, at the instance of the Pope, he made war upon Desiderius, king of the Lombards, who had occupied the Pentapolis and was besieging Rome. He captured the Lombard capital, Pavia, in 774, and the same year incorporated the kingdom of the Lombards with that of the Franks. In 778 he made an expedition against the Arabs in Spain, which terminated in the destruction of the Frankish rear-guard under Roland at Roncesvalles. He subdued Bavaria in 788; conquered the Avars 791–796; was crowned emperor at St. Peter's, Dec. 25, 800, and in 803–810 defeated the Danes, whom he compelled to retire behind the Eider. His kingdom, to the protection of which he erected in the border districts the so-called marks or margraviates, extended at the close of his reign from the Ebro to the Raab, and from the Eider to the Garigliano. He established Lieffs at Aix-la-Chapelle, and by his patronage of letters attracted to his court the scholars Eginhard, Paul Warnefried, and Alcuin, the last-mentioned of whom wrote an account of his life entitled "Vita Caroli Magni."

Charlemagne. A tragedy in five acts by Lemercier, first played at the Théâtre Français, June 27, 1816.

Charlemagne Cycle of Romances. A series of medieval romances having Charlemagne or some one of his twelve peers or paladins as a center. The Frankish heroic ballads were reduced to writing to the order of Charlemagne and from these similar ballads were written about himself and his warriors. These chansons de geste were arranged as cyclic poems in the 14th century, and may be divided into three groups: the "Geste of the King" (Charlemagne), the "Geste of Provence" or of Garin de Montglane, and the "Geste of Doon of Doolin of Mayence." These are all composed of many parts, but may be described, as a whole, as a mythical history of Charlemagne, his peers, and the wars they undertook. The names and number of the peers vary, but Roland and Oliver are included in each of the series. About 1180 a monk of St. Gall wrote a chronicle called "De Gestis Karoli Magni," and another was written by Benedict, a monk of St. Andre, in 836. "The Pseudo-Chronicle of Turpin" was constructed from the chansons: it was written in Latin by various hands from 1090 to 1150, and was believed to be a genuine history. The first prose version of Carolingian romance was the "Reali di Francia" (Princes of France), written in Tuscan early in the 14th century. The first printed French prose version of the cycle was that of Bagnyon, 1478. It became very popular. The chronicle of Turpin, however, was refused by critics early in the 14th century. Among these romances are "Ficabras," "Garin de Montglane" ("Guerin de Montglane"), "Guiron le Courtois," "Milles et Amys" ("Amis et Amys"), "Ogier le Danois," "Doon de la Roche," "Parise," "Quatre Fils Aymon" ("Four Sons of Aymon"), "Maugis d'Aygremont," "Huon of Bordeaux," and others of widely differing date.

It is the center of a coal and iron-mining district, and has manufactures of iron glass, etc. It is one of the most important industrial towns in Belgium. It was fortified by Vauban, 1704; it was captured by the French. Population (1880), 20,068.

Charles (chārlz) I. [L. Carolus, F. Charles, It. Carlo, Sp. Pg. Carlos, G. Karl. See Carl.] Born at Dunfermline, Scotland, Nov. 19, 1600; died at London, Jan. 30, 1649. A king of England, second son of James I. He became prince of Wales in 1612, and in 1625, accompanied by the Duke of Buckingham, presented in person an unethereal suit at the court of Madrid for the hand of the Infanta Maria. He acceded to the throne on the death of his father in 1625, and in the same year married Henrietta Maria of France. He retained in favor the Duke of Buckingham, his father's unpopular minister, in consequence of which he became involved in a dispute with Parliament amounting in substance to a question of sovereignty. He granted the Petition of Right, June, 1628. On the assassination of the Duke of Buckingham in August following, he made Laud and Wentworth his chief advisers. He governed without Parliament from 1629 to 1640, meeting the expenses of government by forced loans, poundage and tonnage, ship-money, and other extra-ordinary means of revenue. His ecclesiastical policy, which looked to many other things, to the introduction of the Episcopal liturgy in Scotland, provoked the adoption by the Scots of the Solemn League and Covenant, Feb. 28, 1638, and the outbreak of civil war, which terminated without a battle in the Pacification of Dunse or Berwick, June 18, 1639. The war having broken out anew in 1640, he was compelled to summon Parliament, which met Nov. 3, 1640. This Parliament, the so-called Long Parliament, impeached Laud and Wentworth (who had been created Earl of Strafford), and proceeded to the redress of grievances. The House of Commons having ordered the publication of the Grand Remonstrance, Dec. 14, 1641, he replied by impeaching and attempting to arrest (Jan. 4, 1642) five of the Parliamentary leaders, failing in which he left London, Jan. 10, 1642. He raised the royal standard at Nottingham, Aug. 22, 1642; suffered a decisive defeat at the hands of the Parliamentary leader under Fairfax at Naseby, June 14, 1645; delivered himself to the Scottish army at Newark, May 5, 1646; was surrendered to Parliament, Jan. 30, 1647; was tried for treason, Jan. 20–27, 1649, and was executed at Whitehall.

Charles II. Born at St. James's Palace, London, May 29, 1630; died at St. James's, Feb. 6, 1685. A king of England, son of Charles I. He was appointed to the command of the Royalist forces in the western counties of England in the civil war, and after the decisive victory of the Parliamentary army at Naseby left England May 16, 1646, having during the war chiefly in France and Holland. He was proclaimed king at Edinburgh Feb. 5, 1649; arrived in the Firth of Cromarty June 16, 1650; was crowned at Scone Jan. 1, 1651; was totally defeated by Cromwell at Worcester Sept. 3, 1651; and escaped after numerous adventures, to Fecamp, Normandy, Oct. 16, 1651. Owing to the influence of General Monk, he was proclaimed king at Westminster May 8, 1660; entered London May 29, 1660; and was crowned April 23, 1661. He married Catherine of Braganza May 20, 1662. He assented at his restoration to the abolition of the feudal rights of knight service, wardship, and purveyance, in consideration of a yearly income to the crown of £1,200,000, and to an act of indemnity for all political offenses committed between Jan. 1, 1637, and June 24, 1660, from the operation of which act, however, the regicides were excluded.

Charles I., surnamed "The Great." See Charlemagne.

Charles (chārlz; F. pron. shārl) II., surnamed "The Bald" (F. le Chauve, G. der Kahle). Born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, June 13, 823; died near Mont Cenis, Alps, Oct. 6, 877. King of France and emperor of the Romans, younger son of Louis le Débonnaire: as king of France, reckoned as Charles I. Louis died in 840, after dividing his empire among his sons Lothaire, Louis, and Charles, the last of whom received all of France lying west of the Rhone. Lothaire having claimed the preeminence, his brothers united against him, defeated him at Fontenay June 25, 841, and compelled him to accept the treaty of Verdun, concluded in Aug., 843. In 875, on the death of Louis II. of Italy without issue, Charles invaded Italy, and after defeating the army of his brother Louis, the rightful heir of Louis II., was crowned emperor by Pope John VIII. at Rome Dec. 25, 875. During his reign France was ravaged by the Normans, who sacked Bordeaux, Tours, Rouen, Orleans, and other cities, including some quarters of Paris.

Charles III., surnamed "The Fat" (F. le Gros, G. der Dicke). Born 839: died at Neidingen, Swabia, Jan. 13, 888. King of France and emperor of the Romans, son of Louis the German: as king of France, reckoned as Charles II. He succeeded 876 after dividing his kingdom among his sons Carloman, Louis, and Charles. He brothers dying without lawful issue, Charles inherited their portions. He was crowned emperor in 881, and in 885 became king or regent of France, whose heir, Charles the Simple, was a minor. In Sept., 886, he concluded a humiliating treaty with the Normans at Paris. He was deposed by Arnulf in November, 887.

Charles III., surnamed "The Simple" (F. le Simple, or le Sot). Born Sept. 17, 879; died at Péronne, France, Oct. 7, 929. A king of France, son of Louis "the Stammerer." He was crowned in 893 by his partizans in opposition to Eudes, who had been elected king by the nobles in 888 over his infant uncle; and on the death of the latter in 898 became sole king. In 912 he ceded Normandy to Rollo.

Charles V., surnamed "The Fair" (F. le Bel). Born 1294; died at Vincennes, near Paris, 1328. A king of France, youngest son of Philip "the Fair." He reigned 1322–28. His sister Isabella was married to Edward II. of England, with whom he was at war concerning the homage for the duchy of Guienne. Isabella having been sent to France to negotiate the question, he permitted her to perfect preparations by means of which Edward was deposed.

Charles V., surnamed "The Wise" (F. le Sage). Born at Vincennes, near Paris, Jan. 21, 1337; died there, Sept. 16, 1380. King of France, son of John II. He reigned 1364–80. He was lieutenant-general or regent of France, 1356–60, during the captivity of his father in England. During his reign France recovered nearly all the territory that had been conquered by Edward III., except Calais and Bordeaux. He was a patron of learning, and founded the Royal Library of Paris.

Charles VI., surnamed "The Well-Beloved" (F. le Bien-Aimé). Born at Paris, Dec. 3, 1368; died at Paris, Oct. 21, 1422. King of France, son of Charles V. He reigned 1380–1422. Being a minor at his accession, the regency was conducted by his uncles the dukes of Anjou, Berri, and Burgundy. He married Isabeau of Bavaria, daughter of Duke Philip van Antwerpe at Roseberge Nov. 27, 1382. In 1388 he assumed the government. Becoming deranged in 1392, a dispute for power ensued between the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, the latter being the king's brother. The ascendancy was gained by the former, who died 1404. His son Jean procured the murder of the duke of Orleans in 1407, and began a civil war, the so-called war of the Burgundians and Armagnacs. Henry V. of England invaded the country, and Oct. 25, 1415, defeated the French army at Agincourt. He was crowned at Rheims in 1429, and entered Paris in 1436. He effected a reconciliation between the Armagnac and Burgundian factions, and regained all of France from the English except Calais.

Charles VIII. Born at Amboise, France, June 30, 1470: died at Amboise, April 7, 1498. King of France, son of Louis XI. He reigned 1483–98. He invaded Italy in 1494 with a view to conquering Naples, which he entered 1495. Ferdinand of Spain, the emperor, and all the Italian powers having united against him, he left the Duke of Montpensier with a strong force in Naples and returned to France with the remnants of his army, defeating on the way the numerically superior allies at Fornovo, July 6, 1495. The French were soon after expelled from Naples by the Spaniards.

Charles IX. Born at St. Germain-en-Laye, near Paris, June 27, 1550: died at Vincennes, near Paris, May 30, 1574. King of France, the second son of Henry II. He reigned 1560–74. Being a minor at his accession, he was placed under the regency of his mother, Catharine de' Medici. He was declared of age in 1563, but the policy of the government continued to be dictated by his mother, under whose influence he consented to the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Aug. 24, 1572.

Charles X. Born at Versailles, France, Oct. 9, 1757: died at Görz, Austria, Nov. 6, 1836. King of France 1824–30, youngest brother of Louis XVIII. He received at birth the name of Charles Philippe and the title of Comte d'Artois. He joined the royalist emigration of 1789. In 1796, having obtained ships and men from England, he commanded an expedition which was to land on the coast of Brittany and join the Vendean chief Charette, but which resulted in failure through the cowardice of its leader, who did not venture to attempt a landing. He entered Paris with the Allies in April, 1814, and Sept. 16, 1824, succeeded his brother Louis XVIII. His government, whose policy was dictated by the ecclesiastical party, became extremely unpopular. After the defeat of the ministries of Villele and Martignac the king formed an extreme royalist ministry under the Prince de Polignac, Aug. 9, 1829. The Chamber of Deputies voted in March, 1830, an address hostile to the ministers, who, appealing to the country, were defeated. Resolving on a coup d'état, the king and ministry issued, July 26, 1830, a body of ordinances which restricted the freedom of the press, established a new mode of election, and declared the recent elections illegal. As a consequence the so-called July revolution, which lasted from July 27–30, broke out, in the course of which Charles was expelled from the throne.

Charles IV. Born at Prague, Bohemia, May 14, 1316: died at Prague, Nov. 29, 1378. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of John of Luxemburg, king of Bohemia. He reigned 1347–78, and published the Golden Bull (which see) in 1356.

Charles V. Born at Ghent, Flanders, Feb. 24, 1500: died at Yuste, near Plasencia, Estremadura, Spain, Sept. 21, 1558. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. He was the son of Philip of Burgundy by Joanna, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, and was the grandson of the emperor Maximilian I. He became king of Spain (as Charles I.) in 1516, was elected emperor in 1519, and was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1520. He attended the diet at Worms in 1521, concluded with Francis I. of France the peace of Cambrai in 1529, attended the diet of Augsburg in 1530, conquered Tunis in 1535, made a fruitless invasion of Provence in 1536–37, conducted an unsuccessful expedition against Algiers in 1541, concluded with Francis I. of France the peace of Crépy in 1544, defeated the forces of the Smalkaldic League at Mühlberg in 1547, was surprised by Maurice of Saxony and forced to conclude the convention of Passau in 1552, and concluded with the Protestants the peace of Augsburg in 1555. He abdicated the government of the Netherlands in 1555, and of Spain and the empire in 1556. He subsequently lived in the monastery of Yuste in Spain. The portraits of this emperor are: (a) a portrait by Titian (1548), in the old Pinakothek at Munich. The emperor is seated, aiming in armor, with an extended view over a rural landscape. He is robed in black, with a fur-lined cloak, and wears the Golden Fleece. (b) A famous portrait by Titian (1548), in the Royal Museum at Madrid. This figure is full-length, clad in a rich dress; the right hand rests on a dagger, and the left on a large dog. (c) An equestrian portrait by Titian, in the Royal Museum at Madrid. This is held to be the finest portrait of the emperor (1548). (d) A portrait by Titian, in the Royal Museum at Madrid. The emperor is portrayed in his privacy, with the marks of illness and age on his face.

Charruas (chä-rō-äs'). The name usually given to a numerous race of Indians who, in the 16th century, occupied the region on both sides of the river Uruguay, ranging to the Paraná and the southern coast. The Bohanes, Minuanes, Vases, and Guenoas were subtribes; but all these names are sometimes applied to the whole race. The Charruas were a dark race, apparently allied to the Chaco tribes. They were wandering hunters and robbers, very savage and treacherous, and waged a destructive war on the Spaniards. Solis, the discoverer of the Plata, was killed by them. They fought principally with the bolas or weighted lasso; later they became skilful horsemen. About 1750 they were partly subdued and formed into villages. The modern Gauchos of Uruguay have much Charrua blood and portions of the race remain in much pure state. They are much employed as soldiers and herdsmen.

Charter, The Great. See Magna Charta.

Charterhouse (chär'ter-hous). [A corruption of Chartreuse; orig. the name of a village in France (ML. Cartusia), near the seat of the orig. monastery of the order, called distinctively La Grande Chartreuse.] A Carthusian monastery (later a hospital, and a school for boys) in London, founded in 1371 by Sir Walter Manny and the Bishop of Northburgh. At the dissolution the Charter House was given by Henry VIII. to Sir Thomas Audley, and passed through various hands to Sir Thomas Sutton, who in 1611 founded on its site a hospital under the name of the Hospital of St. James. This foundation long existed as a hospital for decayed gentlemen and a school for boys. The school was transferred to Godalming, Surrey, in 1872, and the premises are now occupied by the school of the Merchant Tailors' Company. The buildings are for the most part of the early 16th century, and the great hall and the chapel retain much of their original features. The great staircase, great chamber, chapel, and cloister are also of much interest.

Charter Oak, The. A tree celebrated in American (legendary) history, which formerly stood in Hartford, Connecticut. According to tradition, when the charter of Massachusetts Bay and Connecticut of the Assembly the surrender of the colonial charter, the delate in that body over the governor's demand was prolonged beyond daylight, when suddenly the lights were extinguished, and in the darkness a patriot, Captain Wadsworth, escaped with the charter and hid it in a hollow tree. The charter was contemporary record of this event. The Charter Oak was overthrown by a storm in 1856.

Chartier (shär-tyā'), Alain. Born at Bayeux, France, about 1369 (?): died at Avignon (?), France, 1449 (1458 ?), a famous French poet and man of letters. He wrote "Le quadrilogue inventif," "L'Espérance," "La belle dame sans mercy," and numerous other works. His poetry consists mainly of allegorical and controversial love poems and moral verse. He is best known by the story that Margaret of Scotland stooped and kissed his lips while he lay asleep, to the astonishment of the attendants, for the poetry and virtuous sentiments that had issued from them.

Chartists (chär'tists). A body of political reformers (chiefly working-men) that sprang up in England about the year 1838. The Chartists advocated as their leading principles universal suffrage, the abolition of the property qualification for a seat in Parliament, annual parliaments, equal representation, payment of members of Parliament, and vote by ballot, all of which they demanded as constituting the People's Charter. The members of the extreme section of the party, which favored an appeal to arms or in popular risings if the charter could not be obtained by legitimate means, were called "physical-force men." The Chartists disappeared as a party after 1849. Also Charterists.

Chartres (shärtr). The capital of the department of Eure-et-Loir, France, on the Eure 48 miles southwest of Paris; the ancient Autricum, later Carnutum. It has a large trade in grain, and is famous for its cathedral, one of the finest churches of the world, built in the 12th and 13th centuries, and notable for both beauty and solidity. The oldest part is the crypt, which, with the adjoining sculptured portals, and south tower and spire considered the finest of their type. The elegant and ornate north spire is much later. The great triple porches, the interior walls covered with sculpture, are matchless. The interior is simple, but of most impressive dignity. Over 160 of the great windows retain their 13th-century glass: among a display of jewelled color unequaled elsewhere. Other remarkable features are the rose of the west front, and the series of sculptures of the life of Christ and of the Virgin, framed in the richest Renaissance tracery, which adorns the exterior of the choir-screen. Chartres was the capital of the Carnutes, and a center of Druid worship. It was fortified by Charles the Bald, and was the chief town and capital of Beauce. Henry IV. was crowned here king of France in 1593. It was taken by the Germans, Oct., 1870. Population (1891), 23,108.

He is a member of the National Academy, president of the Society of American Artists, and has been the recipient of many honors at home and abroad.

Chasidim (chä-sē'dim), or Assideans. [Heb., 'pious ones, pietists.'] A party which arose among the Jews during the period of the Maccabean struggles. Its object was the defense and maintenance of the Jewish law in all its particulars against the encroachments of Greek customs (Hellenism). It is not improbable that they were the forerunners of the Essenes. In modern times a similar sect has spread among the Jews of eastern Europe and the Orient, which is supposed to have originated with a certain Israel Baal Shem in the 18th century. They strive after a closer communion with God by means of the Kabbalah ('mysticism') and the mediation of a rabbi or zaddik ('just man') whom they believe to be a special favorite of God, and to be endowed with the power of performing miracles by prayer.

Its origin is very obscure. It was at first simply a tower standing on the south approach to the city. There was probably a wooden tower here as early as 885. The earliest mention is in a charter of Louis le Jeune in 1147. The Châtelet was the city prison of Paris in the medieval and Renaissance periods, and was one of the most terrible prisons of the Old World. The prisoners were generally of the more or less helpless class of city and factors, but occasionally persons of a better class were confined in it.

Chatti (kat'i), or Catti (kat'i). [L. Tacitus] Chatti, Gr. (Ptolemy) Χάτται, a German tribe, a branch of the Suevi, first mentioned by Strabo. They originally occupied the Taunus to a point north of the Main, but were assigned by Drusus to the old territory of the sugambri further north and back from the Rhine, in the region about the Fulda and the middle Weser. They took part in the rising under Civilis, and were afterward, down into the 3d century, in frequent conflict with the Romans. They were one of the most powerful of the German inland tribes. Two minor tribes of the Chatti, the Batavi and the Cannunfates were ultimately merged in the Salic Franks. The one left behind in the old territory became finally, the Hessians, a name which appears early in the 8th century.

Chaucer (chä'ser). Geoffrey. [ME. Chaucer, lit. 'Shoemaker,' from OF. chaucier, ML. calcearius, calcivirus, a shoemaker, from L. calceus, calcius, a shoe.] Born at London about 1340; died at London, Oct. 25, 1400. A celebrated English poet. He was the son of a well-to-do London vintner John Chaucer. He was liberally educated, but the precise extent of his early training is not known. It is certain that he was a student at either Oxford or Cambridge. In the year 1357 he as twice mentioned as being in the service of Prince Lionel, the second son of Edward III. In 1359 he was with the king's army in France, and was taken prisoner. According to his own statement, in 1366, he bore arms for twenty-seven years. In 1367 he is described as a valet of the king's household ("dilectus valettus noster"). About this time it is thought that he married Philippa Roet, the eldest daughter of Sir Payne Roet, the king at arms for Guienne, and a native of Hainault, who came to England in the train of Queen Philippa probably in 1328 (Morley.) By 1374 Chaucer had been raised to a higher rank, sent on royal embassies to Italy, etc., and called "Esquire" in official records. He was also made comptroller of the customs of wools, skins, and tanned hides in London, and received other grants, missions, and pensions. John of Gaunt, the younger brother of Prince Lionel, became the patron of Chaucer: in 1396 married for his third wife Catherine Swinford, a widow, who had been his mistress, and who was the sister of Chaucer's wife. From 1374 to 1386 Chaucer lived in the Gate-house of Aldgate. In 1378 he was sent again to Italy, after which he was apparently closely continued by his business in London till 1385, when he was allowed to have a deputy in the office of comptroller of customs of wool, etc. In 1386 he was elected knight of the shire for Kent, but was dismissed from all his various offices and pensions just before the end of the year. By 1390, however, he had, through the patronage of Henry IV., the recently crowned son of John of Gaunt a sufficient income, and took a lease of some years' term of a house on the spot in Westminster where Henry VII.'s chapel now stands: here, however, he lived less than a year. Among his works are—translations: Books before 1380: Origins and Vocabulary; "The Translation of Boethius on the Consolation of Philosophy;" "The Dream of Chaucer" (about 1369), "The Assembly of Fowls," "Of Queen Anelida and False Arcite," "The House of Fame," "Chaucer's A. B. C., called La Prière de nostre Dame." Genuine works after 1380: "The Canterbury Tales," "The Legend of Good Women," "The Conclusions of the Astrolabe," "The Complaint of Mars," "Good Counsel of Chaucer," "Lenvoye to Scogan," "Chaucer unto his Empty Purse;" and Chaucer's Words unto his own Scrivener. Genuine works, dates unknown: "The Complaint of Mars," "The Complaint of Venus" (a translation—Scott), "The Former Age," "How Pity is Dead and Buried in a Gentle Heart," "Against Women Unconstant," "The Complaint of the Rose," "Orison to the Holy Virgin," "An Amorous Complaint," —Spurious works: "A Goodly Ballade of Chaucer," "The Flower of Courtesy, and the Lady," "A Ballade in Commendation of Our Lady," "The Plowman's Tale," "Balade de bon Conseil," "Against Women Unconstant," "The Craft of Lovers, a Ballade," "The Ten Commandments of Love," "The Nine Ladies Worthy," "Chaucer's Wordes unto Adam, his own Scriveyn," "The Tale of Gamelin," "The Prodegate, or the Merry Adventures of the Pardoner and Taperer of the Inn at Canterbury," "The Merchant's Second Tale, or the History of Beryn," "The Testament and Complaint of Cressida" (by Robert Henryson, about 1490), "The Complaint of the Black Knight" (by Lydgate), the first half (the 15th century), "The Cuckoo and the Nightingale" (about 1400, perhaps, but uncertain), "The Letter of Cupid" (by Occleve, 1402), "The Flower and the Leaf" (about 1500), "Occleve's Dream," "The Isle of Ladies" (about 14.0), and "The Flower and the Leaf" (about 1430). Lounsbury.

Chaucer, Thomas. Born about 1367; died March 14, 1434. An English statesman, probably eldest son of Geoffrey Chaucer. He was chief butler of Richard II., constable of Wallingford Castle, keeper of the honors of Wallingford and St. Valery and of the Chiltern Hundreds, successor of Geoffrey Chaucer as toaster of North Petherton, Somersetshire, treasurer, and member of Parliament 1400-31. He was chosen speaker of the House of Commons in 1407, 1410, 1411, and 1414. He was present at the battle of Agincourt.

Chaucer of France, The. A name given to Clément Marot.

Chaucer's Dream. 1. A name once given to "The Book of the Duchess," in which the poet relates his dream.—2. The title of an independent poem, first printed by Thomas Speght in the 1597 edition of the works of Chaucer. He prefixed to it a note as "That which heretofore hath gone under the name of his Dreame, is the Book of the Duchesse: on the death of Blanche, Duchesse of Lancaster."

There is no extant MS. of this poem earlier than one at Longford (about 1565). If the poem be Chaucer's, it is in a late copy, with corruptions of the text, and was an early work of his. I leave its authenticity in question. Ward, Eng. Writers, v. 166.

Chaucer Society, The. A society founded by Mr. Furnivall in 1867 for the purpose of furnishing to scholars material (manuscripts, early texts, etc.) relating to Chaucer which was not accessible to the public, and of facilitating collation.

Cheapside (chēp'sīd). [ME. chepe, market.] The central, east-and-west thoroughfare of the City of London, originally a large open common in the course of Watling street where the markets and public assemblies were held. Different kinds of wares were sold separately, and the names were perpetuated in the streets which were built on where the booths had stood. In the middle ages Cheape was the great street of the retail trade. It was built with the finest houses in the city, and well supplied with churches, the principal one being St. Mary le Bow, so called from its great vault or bow, on the south side. On the south side also was the stone gallery from which royalty received the tournaments which were held here. There were two crosses in Cheap: the principal one was erected by Edward I. to mark the resting-place of his queen, Eleanor of Castile. (See Charing Cross.) The highway ran through the more southern portion of the market-place, and became known as Cheapside. Before the fire in 1666 it was twice as wide as the present street, and was lined with houses five stories high, each story projecting over the one below, and with high gables. According to Sainte-Beuve he is the greatest writer in French verse since the days of Racine and Boileau. He went to the Collège de Navarre in France; was in the army in 1784; in Switzerland and Italy 1785-87; in Paris 1787-89, and to the French embassy in London till 1790, and mainly resorted to literary occupations and studies in Paris. Only two poetical compositions of his appear to be published during the Revolution, "Le jeu de paume à Paris" (on the suggestion by the great painters "serment du jeu de paume"), and "Hymne aux vrais amis de la patrie" (1790). He published after the Reign of Terror, "Avis au peuple français" on seventy-three occasions, brought him a medal of recognition from Stanislas, king of Poland. Chénier's main work is political and he left behind him a fragment on the subject, but he seems to have been of assistance to Mirabeau in preparing the addresses of Louis XVI. and to the king himself in the proposed appeal to the Parisian people March 1, 1791. He was accused of sheltering a public debtor and was sent to prison. On the 7th, their middle he was seven or twenty-four gendarmes and a large group of curious onlookers. A volume of poems was published June 1, 1794, in the Jacobin phrase "with remarks in 'Thermidorian license' and 'to the guillotine every hope.'" La jeune Tarentine appeared in the "Mercure" of March 25, 1809. In a note to Chateaubriand's "memoirs d'outre-tombe" several passages were quoted from the "Histoire" which fragments were inserted by Fayolle in his "Mélanges littéraires" (1810). The first complete edition of Chénier's works was made by Labouche in 1819, the second by A. Becq de Fouquières, the third and fourth again by Labouche in 1823 and 1826, and the fifth by Becq de Fouquières published the first critical edition in 1862, and the second in 1872. An unfinished edition was given by Gabriel Chénier in 1874. Becq de Fouquières pointed out its shortcomings in his "Documents nouveaux sur André Chénier" (1875). He also published in 1881 a revised and enlarged edition of Chénier's "Œuvres en prose," based on the version of Hugo and Latour in 1840; and finally gave the results of his latest researches in "Les Derniers critiques d'André Chénier" (1881).

Cherokee (cher-o-kē'), native Tsalaki. [Pl., also Cherokees.] An important tribe of North American Indians. The name means "upland field," but tribal traditions (England) show it was one invented themselves to their first European visitors. They are probably the people known traditionally to the Delawares as the Talligewi, a powerful body which once occupied the valleys of the Ohio and Allegheny rivers, and afterward was driven south by the Delawares and Iroquois. When first known to Europeans their center was in the southern Alleghanies, and they occupied the mountains of southern Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee. Their chief settlements were on the head waters of the Savannah and Tennessee rivers, and were respectively called Elati Tsalaki, or Lower Cherokee, and Atali Tsalaki, or Upper Cherokee, speaking two different dialects. As the white settlements pressed upon them they retreated westward, until by the treaty of 1785 they sold all their remaining country, and the main body removed to a tract assigned to them on the Mississippi. A considerable number remained behind, and, gradually concentrating in western North Carolina, are now known as the eastern band of Cherokees, numbering about 2,000. Those in the Indian Territory number about 17,000. Both divisions have a large admixture of foreign blood. See Iroquoian.

Chesapeake (ches'a-pēk). The. An American frigate of 38 guns, built at Norfolk, Virginia, in 1799. During the campaign of 1812 she cruised in South American waters. In May, 1813, she returned to Boston, and was placed under the command of Captain James Lawrence. The ship was to proceed to sea against under his direction, but he was obliged to make up his crew of very unsatisfactory material. The British frigate Shannon, thirty-eight guns strong, commanded by Captain Philip Vere Broke, was at this time cruising off Boston harbor. Broke had brought his ship to a high state of efficiency. On June 1, 1813, the Chesapeake put out of Boston harbor, the Shannon being in sight in the offing. The battle occurred six leagues east of Boston light. Immediately after opening fire both ships fell aboard, and Captain Lawrence was mortally wounded. He was carried below exclaiming "Don't give up the ship!" Captain Broke boarded the Chesapeake, and at 6.05 P. M., fifteen minutes after the first gun was fired, her flag was struck.

He published an account of the "Expedition for the Survey of the Rivers Euphrates and Tigris" (1850), etc.

Chester (ches'tėr). [From L. castra, camp. It was the camp of the 20th legion.] The capital of Cheshire, England, situated on the Dee 15 miles south-southeast of Liverpool: the Roman Deva and Castra, and the Celtic Caerleon. It has an extensive trade in cheese, etc. It contains many Roman antiquities, and is notably medieval in appearance. It has a cathedral which presents every variety of English medieval architecture, from the Norman to the last Perpendicular. It has recently been well restored. The exterior is marked by fine ranges of windows and its square central tower. The interior is very effective, the various architectural styles grouping in such manner as to contrast agreeably. The nave has modern fan-vaulting in oak. The south transept is as large as the choir, while the Norman north transept is very small. The choir is of the 13th century; its 15th-century stalls are elaborately canopied and pinnacled. The Lady chapel is an excellent example of Early English. The dimensions of the cathedral measure 203 feet length of transepts, 200; height of vaulting, 78. The cloister is Perpendicular; the rectangular chapter-house and the refectory are Early English. Chester was an important Roman military station, and was destroyed by Æthelfrith of Northumbria in 607, and was rebuilt by Æthelflaed. It surrendered to William the Conqueror in 1070, was long besieged by the Parliamentarians, and was taken by them in 1646. Population (1891), 37,105.

The name of Chester alone proves its Roman antiquity; it also proves its importance, as having come to be known as the city of the camps, castella-ville. Still the name is historically a contradiction. The Roman Deva became in later times the Civitas Legionum, the Castellum of the Welsh, the Legecestir (in several different spellings of the English. Both names, it will be seen, Welsh and English, translate Civitas Legionum, the two tongues, according to their several habits, placing the qualifying word first or last. English names did last in this case. And here we have to distinguish our Caerleon, our Legecester, from other places which might easily be confounded with them. The Welsh Caerleon on the Usk is simply the same as Caerleon on the Usk, and Welsh writers naturally speak of Chester as Caerleon.

Chester Plays, The. A "collection of mysteries" founded upon "scriptural subjects," formerly representated by the guilds of Chester at Whitsuntide. They were twenty-four in number, and were played during three days.

According to the proclamation for the holding of these plays, made in the year 1422, they were to be played "of old time by one sir Henry Francis some time monk of the monastery dissolved," . . . "which plays were (in the 14th century) ordained to the honor of God and Holy Church . . . to be brought forth, declared and played," etc. . . . A note, written in a later hand, adds to the MS. copy of the Antiquarian Society, in the end of the sixteenth century, that sir John Arnway was mayor of Chester in 1327 sat which time these plays were written by Ranulf Biggarett, a monk of Chester Abbey, and played openly in Whitsun plays. Randall Holme's copy of the contributions of the name of Randulphi or Ralph Higden, author of the "Polychronicon," . . . There are several MSS. of Chester Mysteries extant. A MS. belonging to the Duke of Devonshire is dated 1581. A MS. once possessed by Mr. Heber was dated 1592. The two MSS. in the British Museum are dated 1600 and 1607; that at Oxford is dated 1604. A specimen of these Chester Mysteries was printed in 1818 by Mr. Markland for the members of the Roxburghe Club, and in 1851 these and other Mysteries, then unpublished, were described by Mr. Collier in his "History of Dramatic Literature"; but the only complete publication of them has been that made for the Shakespeare Society in 1843, when they were edited by Mr. Thomas Wright.

She was one of the most prominent members of the Cardinal Richelieu, by whom she was, however, eventually forced to leave France. On the death of Louis XIII. she returned, but was coldly received by the queen regent Anne of Austria. Having acted in concert with Cardinal de Retz against Mazarin, she was a second time sent into exile.

Chevy Chase (chev'i chās). A famous old English ballad which recounts the incidents of the battle of Otterburn, though not with the exactness of the Scotch ballad "The Battle of Otterburn," which is historical. The name is variously explained.

In the warfare against English settlements in France such a raid was called by the French allies of Scotland a chevauchée, and [was] a common process; that name was corrupted into Chevy Chase. It [was not among] school-boys as "chivy." Now, since there are in Northumberland Cheviot Hills as well as an Otterburn, Chevy Chase was interpreted into the Hunting of the Cheviot. The old ballad of the "Battle of Otterburn" or "Chevy Chase" . . . the battle of the chevauchée which was its cause . . . was therefore read as "The Hunting of the Cheviot," always with some confused sense of identity between one incident and the other. [In the oldest extant version of "Chevy Chase" the name means "the Cheviot hunting-ground." This version is the manuscript in the Ashmolean Collection, at Oxford. It was printed by Thomas Ricarte, in the year 1447–8. [A] perfect [copy] for an edition of William of Newburgh's Chronicle. . . . Its [date] seems to be about 1500, and it is of the colossal size [which] is nearer to the original than the version [contained in] Reliques." . . . Note.] The battle of Otterburn was incident minutely described by Froissart, and [there is no] circumstance or any similar battle that arose out [of a hunting] on the Cheviots. Mackie, English History, VI., 235.

Cheyenne (shī-en'). [Pl., also Cheyennes; from a Siouan word meaning 'enemies.'] A tribe of North American Indians that claim lands watered by the north and south forks of the Platte River. About 1800 they lived in the Black Hills and on the Cheyenne River of Dakota. Chibchas (chēb'chas), or Muyscas (mūs'kās). A tribe of South American Indians which, previous to the conquest, occupied the highlands east of the Magdalena, from the head waters of that river to the Sierra Nevada de Merida. They were powerful and had attained some degree of civilization, living in large towns and obeying fixed though unwritten laws. They were skilful weavers, potters, and goldsmiths, and practised agriculture, planting maize, quinoa, potatoes and cotton. Their chiefs were hereditary in the female line, had absolute power, and were treated with great ceremony. The Chibchas believed in a Supreme Being, but worshiped the sun, stars, and other natural objects. In 1537 Gonzalo Ximenez de Quesada, a civil war, the Spaniards under Quesada reached their country. They were quickly conquered, and those who survived enslavement and persecution adopted the Spanish language and customs. The descendants mixed with European blood, many change part of the present population of Colombia. The word Chibcha applied to this tribe is supposed to be the name of their language. They called themselves Muysca, i. e. "men."

An English soldier and statesman, second son of Sir John Chichester of Rawleigh, made Lord Chichester of Belfast, in the Irish peerage, Feb. 23, 1613. He was appointed governor of Carrickfergus and sergeant-major general of the English army in Ireland, and was lord deputy of Ireland from Feb. 3, 1605, to Nov. 29, 1614. After his recall he was appointed lord treasurer of Ireland.

Chichevache (ME. chech-e-väch'; mod. F. shēsh-vash'). [ME., as if from an OF. chiche-cache, lean cow (from chiche, poor, lean, and cache (L. vacca), a cow); but this is a perversion of the OF. form chichefaice, chinchefaice (also chanchefache, simulating cache, a cow), lit. "ugly face."] A fabled beast which delights in virtuous and submissive wives. The fable, of Old French origin, became a favorite with Middle English writers, who made the beast a lean cow (see etymology), and ascribed her leanness to the scarcity of her peculiar diet. The fable of another beast named Bicorn (Bicorne, literally, "two-horned"), who lived only on patient and submissive husbands, and was in consequence always fat, Lydgate wrote a poem called "Bycorne and Chichevache."

Chichiltcale (chē-chēl-tē-kä'le). [A corruption of the Nahuatl chichiltic-calli, red house.] A name given by the Mexican Indians who followed Fray Marcos of Nizza to New Mexico in 1539 and Coronado in 1540, to a ruined structure built of red earth or clay, near the banks of the Gila. It has been supposed that it was the Casa Grande, but in all probability it was some ancient ruin near the site of new Fort Grant, in Arizona, along the slopes of Mount Graham.

Chichimecs (chē-chē-mäks'), or Chichimecas, or Chimiecos. [Nahuatl of Mexico; derivation doubtful, but possibly from chichiltic, red, and mecatgatl, generation.] An ancient term used to designate indiscriminately wild and dangerous tribes of Indians. It was also an honorific title, any warrior who distinguished himself by particular valor being called a Chichimeca. The name is still retained in American Spanish. Misunderstood folk-lore has given rise to the belief in the immigration into Mexico of a semi-civilized Chichimec barbarian under this name at some very ancient time.

Chick (chik), Mrs. Louisa. Mr. Dombey's sister in Charles Dickens's "Dombey and Son," a weak and self-satisfied woman who urged the fading Mrs. Dombey to "make an effort."

It embraces the Nasqa and Tsimshian or Tsimshian divisions, which comprise a number of tribes. The estimated number is 5,000. In 1887 about 1,000 removed to Annette Island, 60 miles north of the southern boundary of Alaska, where they are making rapid progress in civilization.

Chimsian. See Tsimshian.

Chimu (chē'mō), also -mu. pl. Chimus. [From the title of their sovereign.] An ancient civilized nation of the Peruvian coast-valleys, between lat. 3° and 11° S. They were entirely distinct from the Incas in language, architecture, and customs. According to tradition they came from beyond sea, and drove out the savages who had occupied the region (about the 12th century). They built ancient cities, remarkable for the size of some of the buildings, the walls ornamented with elaborate arabesques and paintings. Their irrigation and irrigation works were very extensive. The Chimu people excelled in gold and silver work and in the manufacture of cloth and pottery. The Incas called them Yuncas. Descendants of the Chimus live in the coast region, but their language, called Muchicc, is extinct. A grammar and list of words are extant. The ruins of the Chimu cities are the most remarkable archæological remains in Peru. The black pottery commonly seen in museums, and loosely called "Peruvian," was of their manufacture.

Chimu. The name given by archæologists to the ruins of the capital and citadel of the Chimu people, on the sea-shore about 4 miles north of Truxillo, Peru. The remains cover a space 15 miles long and 5 or 6 broad, and embrace the walls of vast palaces and temples, some of them ornamented with arabesque work and paintings. An aqueduct many miles long supplied the city with water, which was received in large reservoirs. There are several sepulchral mounds from which many objects of interest have been obtained.

China (chī'nā). [F. Chine, Sp. Pg. China, It. Cina, Ml. Chinat, Sinar, Ar. Sin; in Gr., as the name of the people, Σῆναι, Ossæ (Ptolemy), a name of unidentified Eastern origin. Another name known to the ancients was L. Serica, Gr. Σηρική (Ptolemy), from L. Seres, Gr. Σῆρες, the people. In later times Cathay (Kitai). Chinese designations. Chung Kwoh (Middle Kingdom), Chung Kwoh Kwoh ('Middle Flowery Kingdom'), etc.] The most important division of the Chinese empire, extending between lat. 18° 15′–41° 25′ N., long. 97° 30′–122° 40′ E. It comprises 19 provinces: Chihli, Shantung, Shansi, Shensi, Kansuh, Honan, Anhwei, Kiangsu, Chekiang, Fokien, Kiangsi, Hupeh, Hunan, Szchuen, Kweichow, Yunnan, Kwangsi, Kwangtung, and Formosa. The capital is Peking. The surface is mountainous in the northwest, level in the northeast, and hilly in the south. The chief rivers are the Peiho, Hwangho, Yangtsz Kiang, Min, and Pearl. The leading products are rice, tea, silk, cotton, sugar, pulse, cereals, tobacco, coal, iron, copper, etc. The chief exports are tea, silk, straw goods, porcelain, etc. The government is administered by viceroys of provinces, who report to the central autocratic power at Peking. The principal religions are Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism: the philosophical system known as Confucianism is somethines erroneously classed with them. The Chinese assign a fabulously early origin to their nation. Among the semi-mythical kings is Fuhi. From about the era of Confucius (in the 6th century B. C.) the dates become more trustworthy. In the 3d century B. C. was the Tsin dynasty which built the Great Wall. It succeeded the Han dynasty when the empire was consolidated. Buddhism was introduced in the 1st century A. D. Soon after the empire became disorganized, but was again consolidated about 600. There followed a brilliant period, especially in literature, interrupted by Tatar attacks. Jenghiz Khan and his successors conquered the country, and Kubla Khan (end of the 13th century) ruled China and most of Asia, founding a Mongol dynasty. The Ming dynasty followed in 1368, and in the 16th century Portugal obtained a foothold at Macao. The present Manchu dynasty of Tsing acceded in 1644. The empire attained a westward extension in the 18th century. The Opium War with Great Britain began in 1839, and ended in 1842 with the cession of Hong-Kong and the opening of certain treaty ports; portuguese spread to France and the United States in 1844. The Taiping rebellion (which see) broke out in 1850, and was suppressed in 1864. Meanwhile Anglo-French wars in 1856–58 and 1859–60 resulted in the victory of the allies. China made concessions to Russia also in 1858, but in 1881 received back from Russia the province of Kuldja. War with France 1884–85 terminated in favor of the French. Area of China proper, 1,536,341 square miles; population, 385,350,020. Area of the whole empire, 4,218,491 square miles; population, 402,680,000.

Christian's reasoning became impaired as a consequence of dissipation, the usual physician to the princes, employed to restore his health, Caroline Matilda, sister of George III. of England, found through an appointment in 1770 as prime minister, her husband's confidence in the government. Her ascendency was principal power Jan. 1, 1772, and on his death while the queen was banished by the nobles, was regent and the surname One Hundred Days. The next year she assumed the government April 14, 1784, and had herself declared regent.

Christian VIII. Born at Copenhagen, Sept. 18, 1786; died at Copenhagen, Jan. 20, 1848. King of Denmark 1839–48, and Duke of Schleswig-Holstein 1839–48; son of Christian Frederick, and grandson of Frederick V. He succeeded his father, and was involved in a dispute with the Schleswig-Holstein Estates, which soon developed into a revolutionary movement, and became involved as a contestant in an unequal contest with Prussia, Austria, and other German powers. By the treaty of London (1852) Schleswig-Holstein and Lauenburg fell to Denmark, and Prussian and Austrian troops invaded Schleswig Feb. 1, 1864. By the treaty of Vienna, Christian finally renounced all claims to Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg. He had issue Crown Prince Frederick (born June 3, 1843; Alexandra (princess of Wales), born Dec. 1, 1844; George I. (king of the Hellenes), born Dec. 24, 1845; Dagmar (empress of Russia), born Nov. 26, 1847; Thyra, duchess of Cumberland, born Sept. 29, 1853; Prince Waldemar, born Feb. 27, 1858.

Cicero. A surname given to Johann, elector of Brandenburg 1486-99, on account of his eloquence.

Cicero (sis'e-ro), Marcus Tullius. Born at Arpinum, Italy, Jan. 3, 106 B. C.; assassinated near Formiæ, Italy, Dec. 7, 43 B. C. A celebrated Roman orator, philosopher, and statesman. He served in the Social War in 89, traveled in Greece and Asia 79-77, was quæstor in Sicily in 75, was elected Tribune in 70, was edile in 69, practor in 66, as such suppressed Catiline's conspiracy in 63. He was banished in 58, living in Thessalonica, and was recalled in 57. He was proconsul of Cilicia in 51-50, joined the Pompeians in 49, lived at Brundisium, Sept. to Sept., 47, pronounced the Philippics against Antony 44-43, and was proscribed by the second triumvirate and slain in 43. Of his orations 57 are extant, with fragments of 20 others; nothing is known certain concerning 25; five of these were never delivered. Yearnst Orations (four speeches each), see Catiline, "For Archias," "For A. Cluentius Habitus," "For Caius Rabirius," "For Murena," "For Sestius," "For Milo" (speech as delivered), and Philippics (which see). His school works include "Rhetorica," "De oratore," "De republica," "De legibus," "Academica," "Paradoxa Stoicorum," "Cato major," "De amicitia," "De senectute," "Laelius," "De officiis" (see these titles); there are besides four collections of his correspondence. He also wrote poetry, including an epic on Marius.

Cicero, Quintus Tullius. Born about 102 B. C.: killed 43 B. C. A Roman commander, younger brother of Marcus Tullius Cicero, distinguished in Gaul in 54.

Cicero's younger brother. Quintus (c. 652 102 711 43), took much interest in literature, especially in poetry, and seems to have resembled his brother in facility of composition, but he never attained any distinction. He undertook an annalistic epic and translated tragedies of Sophokles and the like. We possess by him the Commentariolum petitionis, a missive addressed to his brother Marcus, composed early in 64 and a few letters.

Cid (sid; Sp. pron. the'ith). The: called also El Campeador (käm-pe-a-dōr') (Ruy or Rodrigo Diaz de Bivar). [Cid, Sp., representing Ar. Sayyid, master; el Campeador, Sp., the champion or challenger.] The hero of the earlier Spanish epic. He was born at Burgos, Spain, about 1040; died at Valencia, Spain, July, 1099. The principal national hero of Spain, famous for his exploits in the wars with the Moors.

The title of Cid, by which he is almost always known, is often said to have come to him from the remarkable circumstance that the Moorish kings of Africa had challenged him in one battle as the Seid, or their lord and conqueror; and the title of Campeador, or Champion by which he is usually known, though it is commonly assumed to have been given to him as a leader of the armies of Sancho the Second, has long since been most obviously a more precise popular expression of the admiration of his countrymen for his triumphs against the Moors. At any rate, from a very early period he has been called El Cid Campeador, or The Lord Champion.
Ticknor, Hist. Span. Lit., I. 12.

In this critical age we are frequently obliged to abandon with regret the most charming traditions of our childhood's histories, and the Cid has not been spared. A work just published by an ecclesiastical Oriental has to prove that the redoubtable Challenger was by no means the hero he was supposed to be; that he was freeborn and rich, and a vassal of the Caliph; in a word, that his story of the Cid was a tissue of inventions, and he himself but an avowed "of the Cid" to conceal these misleading narratives. He founds his criticisms mainly on the Arabic historians, by whom, despite their national and religious bias, he places as blind a reliance as less learned people have placed in the Chronicle of the Cid. Yet it is surprising how trifling are the differences that can be detected between his "real Cid" and that redoubtable Paynim of the Cid, the ghostly-one of which was compiled by Alfonso the learned only half a century after the Cid's death, and which Robert Southey translated into English verse with such skill and character of style that his version has ever since been almost as much a classic as the original. Every one can speak for himself the obviously legendary, half-dark-ages, delightful old Chronicle without any assistance from the Arabic historians, who deal chiefly with one period alone of the Cid's career, and the best-popular account of the hero in discriminating hands and with due allowances, is still Southey's fascinating Chronicle. The Cid of the Chronicle is not at all the same as the Cid of the Romances, and while we cheerfully abandon the latter immaculate personage, we may still believe in the former.
Poole, Story of the Moors, p. 102.

Cid, Romances of the. 1. A Spanish poem ("Poema del Cid") composed by an unknown author about 1200. It consists of more than 3,000 lines, and is a bold and spirited exhibition of national peculiarities in the chivalrous times of Spain. It was printed first by Sánchez in the first volume of his "Poesías castellanas Antiguas" at Sagun AV. (Madrid, 1779–90). Tickner.

2. An old poetical Spanish chronicle ("Cronica Rimada de las Cosas de España"), nearly the whole of which is devoted to the history of the Cid. It is later than the "Poema del Cid," and was first published by Michel in the "Jahrbucher der Literatur." Vol. CXV., at Vienna in 1846. Both these poems seem built up from older ballads.

3. The "Chronicle of the Cid," date unknown, printed in 1512, the same in substance with the history of the Cid in the "General Chronicle of the History of Spain" composed and compiled by Alfonso the Wise about 1260.—4. A Spanish tragedy ("Las mocedades del Cid Campeador") by Guillen de Castro. It appeared in 1618.—5. A French tragedy ("Le Cid") by Pierre Corneille, represented in 1636.

Cienfuegos y Jovellanos (thē-en-fwā'gōs ē hō-vel-yä'nōs), José. Born at Gijon, Asturias, Spain, 1768; died at Madrid, 1825. A Spanish general. He was a cadet in 1777, served in the French wars, and from April, 1795, to the end of 1810 was captain-general of Cuba. In 1822 he was ministered war, and at the time of his death councilor of war and lieutenant-general and director-general of artillery. The town of Cienfuegos, Cuba, founded during his rule, was named in his honor.

Cieza (thē-e-a'thä). A small town in the province of Murcia, Spain, near the Segura northwest of Murcia.

Cieza de Leon (thē-ā-thä dā lā-ōn'), Pedro de. Born at Llerena, Spain, 1518; died at Seville, 1560. A Spanish soldier, author of the "Compendio de Historia." From about 1534 to 1550 he was with the Spanish armies in America, serving in New Granada and Peru and traveling extensively. His "Cronica, or history, of Peru was commenced in 1541, and completed in four parts. Part I., a general description of the country, was published in 1553; and part 2, with a portion of part 3, in modern times; other portions are known to be, but several books are lost. Cieza de Leon is one of the best authorities on the early history of Peru and the customs of the Incas.

Cignani (chēn-yä'nē), Count Carlo. Born at Bologna, Italy, May 15, 1628; died at Forlì, Italy, Dec. 6, 1719. An Italian painter of the Bolognese school. His chief work is an "Assumption of the Virgin," painted in the cupola of the cathedral at Forlì.

Cignaroli (chēn-yä-rō'lē), Giovanni Bettino. Born at Salò, near Verona, Italy, 1706; died at Verona, Dec. 1, 1770. An Italian painter of the Venetian school.

Cignoli. See Cigoli, Ludovico.

Cihuayn (sē-gwī'), or Higuey (ē-gwē'). The Indian name for a portion of the eastern part of the island of Santo Domingo, bordering on Samana Bay. It was first visited by Columbus in 1493. The natives were warlike, and resisted the Spaniards for many years.

Cihuacohuatl (sē-wä'kō-wä'tl). [Nahuatl, 'snake-woman.'] In Mexican (Nahuatl) mythology, Tonantzin ('our mother'), the first mother of mankind, who begat twins, male and female, from which sprang the human race. According to Sahagun she was the goddess of adverse things, of sickness, of hardness, and the patroness of medicine and absolution. Also written Chiuatcouatl, Cioacoatl, Ciucoatl, etc.

Cilia (sil'i-ä). One of the Mexican civil head-chief. It has lately been suggested that his title may have been Chiucouatl, which would signify 'twin woman.' The civil head of the Mexican tribe was elective as well as the war chief, but, like the latter, religious functions connected with his administrative duties.

Cilicia (si-lish'i-ä). [Gr. Κιλικία.] In ancient geography, a province in southeastern Asia Minor, separated by the Taurus from Lycaonia and Cappadocia on the north, and by the Amanus from Syria on the east, and extending toward the sea. It was first subject to Assyria, and passed over in turn to Persian, Macedonian, and Syrian supremacy. During the Syrian period many Greeks and Jews settled in Cilicia. Its capital, Tarsus, was the birthplace of Paul, and the seat of a celebrated school of philosophy. In 63 B. C. it became a Roman province.

Cilli (tsil'lē), Slovenian Celje. A town in Styria, Austria-Hungary, on the Sann in lat. 46° 14′ N., long. 15° 15′ E.: the Roman Claudia Celeja, founded by Claudius. It is a summer resort. It was governed by counts in the later middle ages. Population (1880), 6,594.

Cimabue (chē-mä-bō'ä), Giovanni. Born at Florence, 1240; died there, about 1302. A noted Italian painter, called "The Father of Modern Painting." He is mentioned as a forerunner of Giotto by Dante, who thereby gives occasion to his own anonymous commentator, writing in 1334, to make some remarks upon Cimabue's fame and ambition, quoted by Vasari. Cimabue practised painting on wall-panels and mosaics. The works accredited to him are simply assumed on Vasari's authority, without corroborative testimony. They consist of: (a) several large Madonnas on panels with gold grounds. The most celebrated is that in the chapel of the Rucellai Gardens in Santa Maria Novella in Florence. There is another in the Louvre, and another in the Academia at Florence. They are effective from their mild solemnity and simple color, which is lively and clear in the flesh-tints. (b) Frescoes in the Church of San Francisco d'Assisi, quite similar to the panels, but slighter and more decorative. (c) Mosaics in the apse of the cathedral of Pisa, the only work well authenticated as his by original documents, and probably his last.

Cima di Jazzi (chē'mä dē yät'sē). A mountain of the Valais Alps, on the border of Italy, east of Zermatt. Height, 12,526 feet.

Cimarosa (chē-mä-rō'sä), Domenico. Born at Aversa, near Naples, Dec. 17, 1749; died at Venice, Jan. 11, 1801. An Italian composer of opera. His chief opera is "Il matrimonio segreto" ("The Secret Marriage," 1792).

Cimarron (sē-mä-rōn'). [Sp., 'wild.'] A name given to the Canadian River in northern New Mexico (Rio Cimarron).

Cimarrones (sē-mä-rō'nes). [Sp. cimarron, untaming, whence ultimately E. marroon, marrooner.] A name given in the Spanish colonies of America to fugitive slaves; in particular, the bands of fugitive negroes who collected on the isthmus of Panama about the middle of the 16th century. They numbered many hundred, built walled towns, attacked the Spanish settlements, robbed treasure-trains, and made quite a terror in all parts of the isthmus. Under their chief or "king," Bayano, they resisted the forces of Pedro de Ursua for two years, but were at last defeated and subdued. They were finally settled. In 1572 they joined forces with the English adventurer Drake, and for many years they aided the buccaneers in their descents on the isthmus. Finally they became amalgamated with the Indian tribes.

Cimbebasie. See Ndonga.

Cimbri (sim'bri). [L., Gr. Κίμβροι.] An ancient people of central Europe, of uncertain local habitation and ethnographical position. They pushed southward upon Pannonia in 113 B. C., and in company with the Teutons and Gauls engaged with and defeated Roman armies in southern Gaul and elsewhere (the most notable defeat being that at Orange, Arausio in 105 B. C.) until 101 B. C., when they were defeated and virtually exterminated by Marius on the Raudian fields in northern Italy. The peninsula of Jutland was named from them (the Cimbrie Chersonese).

Cimmarians. See Cimmerians.

Cimmeria (si-mē'ri-ä). [Gr. Κιμμερία.] The country of the Cimmerians (which see), fabled to be a place of perpetual darkness.

Æschylus places Cimmeria in close proximity to the Palus Mæotis and the Bosporus, but the later writers of Herodotus were still existing a number of names recalling the fact of the former settlement in these regions of the Cimmerian nation. Rawlinson, Herod., I. 179.

Cimmerian Bosporus (si-mē'ri-an bos'pō-rus). The strait between the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov. The Cimmerian side was colonized by a Greek expedition from Miletus in 438 B. C. It flourished until absorbed in the dominions of Mithridates, and for some centuries after that was ruled by native princes of high ability and prosperity. Relations which became intimate were early established with Athens, which sent her oil, jewelry, and vessels of pottery in return for vessels of wheat. The chief city was Panticapæum, the modern Kertch, the center of the highly important archæological discoveries which have been yielded in this region as well as by the territory around it. The first systematic excavations were made in 1816. Since 1832 explorations have been regularly conducted by the Imperial Archæological Society, which, rich in Greek industrial antiquities, are in the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg. The architectural remains are scanty, perhaps the chief of them being the fine revetment, in marble faced ashlar with Doric order, of the so-called Tumulus of the Czar at Kertch. The sculpture found, too, is scanty in quantity, late in date, and poor in style. The great archæological wealth of the region lies in its abundant burial tumuli and catacombs. It was the practice of the ancient inhabitants to bury with their dead a large part of their possessions; hence the remarkable harvest of jewelry, vases, implements, and even textile fabrics and a pair of woman's leather boots, found in these graves. Little or nothing discovered is older than the 4th century B. C.: the finest specimens of jewelry and pottery are Athenian, and include some of the most beautiful work known in their classes. Many of the vases are decorated in brilliant polychrome; others have gilded ornament, and others bear figures in relief. The work of local manufacture is inferior in style, though much of it is very beautiful, and with the advance of time Scythian influence increases. Some of the tomb-chambers bear interesting mural paintings.

Cimmerians (si-mē'risjanz), or Cimmarians (si-mā'risjanz). [Gr. Kimmerioi.] A people dwelling north of the Black and the Maeotian seas (modern South Russia, known already to Homer. Herodotus speaks of "Cimmerian cities," and says that that strait which unites the Azov sea to the Black Sea was called Cimmerian Bosphorus. In the 7th century, pressed by the Scythians, the Cimmerians invaded the kingdom of Lydia in Asia Minor, and were merciless as it seems, in other matters. Their invasion of Lydia under King Gyges is mentioned in the annals of Esarhaddon (680–668 B.C.) and Asurbanipal (668–626), where they are called Gimirri. The Armenian call Cappadocia Gamirk, which is probably a reminiscence of the Cimmerian invasion in Lydia and Asia Minor. Their name has also survived in the modern Crimea. In the Old Testament they are mentioned by the name of Gomer (Gen. x. 2). Also Kimmerians.

Cimmerii (si-mē'ri-i). See Cimmerians.

Cimon (si'mon). [Gr. Kimon.] Died at Citium, Cyprus, 449 B.C. A celebrated Athenian commander, son of Miltiades. He defeated the Persians on sea and land by the Eurymedon in 466, reduced Thasos in 463, and was ostracized about 460–461 B.C.

Cimon. Born at Cleonæ, in Chalcidice. A Greek painter, famous in antiquity. He is mentioned in two epigrams of Simonides, who died 462 B.C.

Cinabar. See Cinnabar.

Cincinnati (sin-si-na'ti). [Originally called Losantiville (said to be from L(icking) os ('mouth') anti ('opposite') ville, 'town opposite the mouth of the Licking'); later named from the Society of the Cincinnati.] The capital of Hamilton County, Ohio, on the Ohio in lat. 39° 6′ N., long. 84° 27′ W.: the largest city of Ohio and of the Ohio valley, surnamed "The Queen City." It is on a series of terraces on the Ohio and river. Among its leading industries are pork-packing, meat-packing, tobacco, bituminous coal-mining, and distilled liquors. It has a large trade in grain and tobacco. Its subterranean connections and transportation facilities were founded in 1788, and incorporated as a city in 1819. Population (1890) 296,908.

Cincinnati, Society of the. An association founded by the regular officers of the continental regiments of Baron Steuben on the Hudson River, in 1783. Its name is derived from the Roman citator L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, was adopted in direct opposition to the hereditary tendency to perpetuity. Each member was to leave to the eldest male descendant of the family the right of membership. It was divided into State societies, including a general society in France. It met with considerable opposition on account of its alleged aristocratic tendencies. Its first president-general was Washington, who was succeeded by Hamilton and the Pinckneys. Of its State societies six survive. The branch society in France, which was organized under the most favorable auspices, was dispersed by the overthrow of Louis XVI.

Cincinnatus (sin-si-nā'tus). Lucius Quinctius. Born about 519 B.C. A Roman legendary hero. He was consul sufficiently, and distinguished himself as an opponent of the plebeians in the struggle between them and the patricians. In 458 B.C. Æquians under C. Julius Mentus having been surrounded by the Romans under the consul Minucius, he was named dictator in the senate, and appointed to conduct the war. After his appointment, found him digging in the field on his farm beyond the Tiber. He gained a complete victory over the Æquians, gave up his dictatorship after sixteen days, and lived sixteen days more. In 439, at the age of eighty, he was appointed dictator to oppose the tyrant Spurius Mœlius, who was defeated and slain. The details of his story vary.

Cinco de Mayo (thēn'kō dā mā'yō). Battle of the. [Sp., 'fifth of May.] The name given by Mexicans to an action fought May 5, 1862, before Puebla, in which the monarchists under General Marquez were defeated by the republicans. This battle did not at present the establishment of an empire, even for a time, but it was decidedly great triumph for republican principles and the anniversary is still celebrated.

Cinderella (sin-de-rel'ä). [F. Cendrillon, G. Aschenbrödel, Aschenputtel.] In a noted fairy tale, a beautiful girl who lives as housekeeper and drudge to her stepmother and step-sisters. The prince of the country falls in love with her at a ball which she attends dressed by her fairy godmother in magic finery which will vanish at midnight. Hurrying from the palace as the clock strikes, she loses one tiny glass slipper, by means of which it as it would fit no one else, the prince finds and marries her. In Scandinavian legend of the fairy god mother two white doves befriend her, and her golden slipper is caught, as she runs from the palace, by pitch spread, by order of the prince, on the staircase. The story is of very ancient, probably Eastern, origin. It is mentioned in German literature in the 16th century, and a similar legend is told in Egypt of Rhodopis and Psammetichus. In France Perrault and Madame d'Aulnoy included it in their "Fairy Tales" as "Cendrillon" and "Finette Cendron," and Grimm also gives it in his "Household Tales." There are many English versions, and it is found in various tongues almost every language in Europe. The glass slipper of the English version should be a fur slipper, the mistake arising in the translation of vair (fur) as if verre (glass).

Classis (klas'is). [L.] See the quotation.

> The town of Ravenna was already three miles distant from the sea (no doubt owing to a previous alteration of the coast line), but the Augustus improved the then existing harbour, to which he gave the appropriate name of Classis, and connected it with the old town by a causeway, about which clustered another intermediate town called Caesarea. Classis, then, in the days of the Roman emperors, was a busy port and arsenal—Wapping and Chatham combined capable of affording anchorage to 250 vessels, resounding with all the noises of men "whose cry is in their ships." Go to it now, and you find one of the loneliest of all lonely moors, not a house, scarcely a cottage in sight; only the glorious church of San Apollinare and southward, along the Pacific coast, nearly to Fiumicoli Head, Oregon. There are still a few survivors residing about six miles above the mouth of the Columbia River in Oregon, and also a few on the Grande Ronde reservation in the same State. See Chinookian.

Claude (klâd; F. pron. klōd), Jean. [F. Claude, from L. Claudius.] Born at La Sauvetat, near Agen, France, 1619: died at The Hague, Netherlands, Jan. 13, 1687. A celebrated French Protestant clergyman and controversialist. A celebrated French landscape-painter. Taken in 1613 to Rome by a relative, he went thence to Naples, where he spent two years as a pupil of Godfrey Wals, a painter from Cologne. From 1619 to 1621 he lived in Rome, working as an apprentice and valet to Agostino Tassi, who was employed by the Cardinal di Montalto to decorate his palace. After this he returned to Lorraine by Venice and the Tyrol. At Nancy he was employed in decorating the Church of the Carmes, for Duke Charles III., with figures and architectural ornaments, until the middle of the year 1627, when he returned to Rome to remain for the rest of his life. By 1634 Claude had become a celebrity in Rome, and had painted many pictures. The "Liber Veritatis," a collection of drawings (the outline tracings of his finished pictures (later engraved and published) was begun about 1634 and finished March 25, 1675. The "Claude Lorrain mirror" is so called from the fancied similarity of its effects to his pictures.

Claudius (klâ'di-us). I. (Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus). [L., 'lame'; II. Sp. Claudio, F. Claude.] Born at Lugdunum, Gaul, Aug. 1, 10 B. C.: died 54 A. D. Emperor of Rome 41–54. He was the grandson of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia, who afterward married Augustus, and son of Drusus and Antonia, the daughter of Marc Antony. Being feeble in mind and body, he was excluded from public affairs by his predecessor, although the empty honor of a consulship was bestowed on him in 37 by his nephew Caligula, on whose murder in 41 he was proclaimed emperor by the prætorian guards. Naturally of a mild and amiable disposition, his accession was signalized by acts of clemency and justice, which, however, under the influence of his third wife, the infamous Valeria Messalina, and his favorites, the freedmen Narcissus, Pallas, and others, were subsequently obscured by cruelty and bloodshed. He visited Britain in 43. In 49, after the execution of Messalina, who, during his absence at Ostia, had contracted a public marriage with Caius Silus, he married his niece Agrippina the younger. She persuaded him to set aside his own son Britannicus, and to adopt her son by a former marriage, L. Domitius, as his successor. Repenting of this step soon after, he was poisoned by Agrippina, and L. Domitius ascended the throne under the name of Nero. The famous Claudian aqueduct in Rome is named for him.

Clearchus (klē-ar'kus). [Gr. Κλέαρχος.] Born at Sparta: executed by Artaxerxes, 401 B.C. A Lacedæmonian general. He fought under Mindarus at the battle of Cyzicus 410. In 405 his tyrannous conduct as harmost during the siege of Byzantium by the Athenians led to the surrender of the city by the inhabitants during his absence in Asia, whither he had gone to collect a force to raise the siege. In 406 he fought under Callicratidas at the battle of Arginusæ. After the Peloponnesian war he persuaded the ephor to send him as general to Thrace to protect the Greeks against the natives; and, having proceeded thither in spite of an order for his recall which overtook him on the way, was condemned to death. Defeated by a force sent against him under Panthoides, he fled to Cyrus the Younger, under whom he commanded a body of Greek mercenaries in the expedition against Artaxerxes, 401. After the battle of Cunaxa, in which Cyrus was killed, he was treacherously seized, with four other Greek generals, by Tissaphernes at a conference, and sent to Artaxerxes, who ordered them to be put to death. The surviving Greeks, however, having chosen new generals, accomplished the famous retreat known as the "Retreat of the Ten Thousand." See Xenophon, Anabasis.

Cleisthenes (klīs'the-nēz), or Clisthenes (klis'the-nēz). [Gr. Κλεισθένης.] An Athenian politician, son of Megacles, and grandson of Cleisthenes of Sicyon. He developed in a democratic spirit the constitution of Solon (adopted 594 B.C.) by substituting ten new for four old tribes, with a view to breaking up the influence of the landowning aristocracy, the new tribes being composed not of contiguous demes or local communities, but of demes scattered about the country and interspersed with those of other tribes. He was expelled in 507 by Isagoras, leader of the aristocratic party, aided by a Spartan army under Cleomenes; but was recalled in the same year by the populace, which compelled the Spartans to withdraw and sent Isagoras into exile. He is said to have established the ostracism, or power of the sovereign popular assembly to decree, without process of law, by means of a secret ballot, the banishment of any citizen who endangered the public liberty.

Cleland (klē'land), John. Born 1709: died Jan. 23, 1789. An English writer. He was the author of the notorious novel "Fanny Hill, or the Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" (1748–50), and "Memoirs of a Coxcomb" (1751). He was consul at Smyrna, and in 1736 was in the service of the East India Company at Bombay. In the latter part of his life he wrote for the stage and also dabbled in philology.

He was apprenticed to a printer at the age of thirteen; became a pilot on the Mississippi in 1861; went to Nevada in 1861, and became city editor of the "Enterprise" in Virginia City in 1862; removed to San Francisco in 1865; visited the Sandwich Islands in 1866; and traveled in Europe and the East in 1867. He resides in Hartford, Connecticut. In 1884 he established at New York the publishing-house of C. L. Webster and Co. His works include "The Innocents Abroad" (1869), "Roughing It" (1872), "A Tramp Abroad" (1880), "Jumping Frog, etc." (1867), "The Gilded Age," conjointly with C. D. Warner (1873), "Sketches, new and old" (1875), "Adventures of Tom Sawyer" (1876), "Adventures of Huckleberry Finn" (1884), "A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur" (1889), etc.

Clement (klem'ent) I., Saint: also called Clemens Romanus (klē'menz rō-mā'nus) ('the Roman'). [L. Clemens, merciful, mild; It. Sp. Clemente, F. Clément, G. Clemens.] Lived in the 1st century A.D.: died probably about 100. A bishop of Rome: according to the common tradition, the third bishop of Rome after St. Peter. Nothing is known with certainty concerning his personal history, but he was a prominent presbyter of the Christian congregation at Rome immediately after the apostolical age. He is by some identified with the Clement addressed by St. Paul (Phil. iv. 3 as his fellow-laborer, by others with the consul Flavius Clemens who was put to death by Domitian on a charge of atheism. Traditionally he is numbered among the martyrs; but according to Eusebius and Jerome, he died a natural death in the third year of the reign of Trajan. Numerous writings most of which are evidently spurious, have been attributed to him. The most celebrated among these are two "Epistles to the Corinthians," which were held in the greatest esteem by the early Christians. They disappeared from the Western Church after the 5th century, and were redis-covered in the Codex Alexandrinus (a present from Cyrillus Lucaris to Charles I.) by Patricius Junius (Patrick Young), who published them at Oxford in 1633. Another MS. was discovered by Philotheos Bryennios in the convent library of the patriarch of Jerusalem, and published in 1875.

Clement II. (Suitger). Died at Pesaro, Italy, Oct. 9, 1047. Pope 1046–47.

Clement III. (Guibert). Died at Ravenna, Italy, 1100. An archbishop of Ravenna, elected pope (antipope), through the influence of the emperor Henry IV., in 1080. After having been expelled from Rome, he made his submission to Paschal II. in 1099.

Clement III. (Paolo Scolari). Born at Rome. Died March, 1191. Pope 1187–91. He preached the third crusade, against the Saracens, who under Saladin had retaken Jerusalem, Oct. 3, 1187.

Clement IV. (Guy Foulques). Born at St. Gilles on the Rhône, France: died at Viterbo, Italy, Nov. 29, 1268. Pope 1265–68. He held a high position at the court of Louis IX., when the death of his wife in 1256 led him to enter the church. He became bishop of Narbonne 1259, cardinal 1262, and was on a journey to England as papal legate when he was elevated to the see of Rome, 1265. He favored Charles of Anjou in his conquest of Naples, which was ruled by Manfred, the illegitimate son of the emperor Frederick II., and which had been granted to Charles by the preceding pontiff, Urban IV.

Clement VI. (Pierre Roger). Born near Limoges, France, 1292: died at Villeneuve d'Avignon, France, Dec., 1352. Pope 1342–52. He established the jubilee for every fifty years, and purchased Avignon in 1348. During his pontificate Cola de Rienzi attempted to reestablish the republic at Rome.

Clement VII. (Count Robert of Ghent). Born about 1342: died at Avignon, Sept., 1394. An antipope elected 1378 in opposition to Urban VI.

Clement VII. (Giulio de' Medici). Born at Florence about 1475: died at Rome, Sept., 1543. Pope 1523–34. He was the illegitimate son of Giuliano de' Medici, and cousin of Leo X. He entered into a league with France, England, Venetia, and other Italian states against the emperor Charles V., and, being besieged in Rome by an imperial army under Constable Bourbon, was compelled to capitulate Jan. 5, 1527. He fled to Orvieto Dec. 9, 1527, but concluded a peace with Charles in 1529, and crowned him emperor at Bologna in 1530. He forbade (1534) the divorce of Henry VIII. of England from Catharine of Aragon.

Clement VIII. (Ægidius Nuños). Antipope 1424–29. He resigned in 1429, thus terminating the great Western schism.

Clement VIII. (Ippolito Aldobrandini). Born at Fano, Italy, 1536: died March 5, 1605. Pope 1592–1605. He absolved Henry IV. of France in 1595, and ordered a revised edition (the "Clementine") of the Vulgate in 1592.

Clement IX. (Giulio Rospigliosi). Born at Pistoja, Italy, 1600: died Dec. 9, 1669. Pope 1667–69. He mediated in 1668 the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle between Louis IX. and Spain, and the "Pax Clementina," which brought the Jansenist controvesy to a temporary conclusion.

Clement X. (Emilio Altieri). Born at Rome, July 13, 1590: died July 22, 1676. Pope 1670–76. He was eighty years old at his election, and was completely under the influence of his relative Cardinal Paluzzi. During his pontificate commenced the controvery with Louis XIV. concerning the enjoyment, during vacancy, of episcopal revenues and benefices, and the right of appointment to such vacancies.

Clement XI. (Giovanni Francesco Albani). Born at Pesaro, Italy, July 22, 1649: died March 19, 1721. Pope 1700–21. He was at war with the emperor Joseph I. 1708–09, and published bulls directed against the Jansenists: "Vineam Domini" (1705) and "Unigenitus" (1713).

Clement XII. (Lorenzo Corsini). Born 1652: died Feb. 6, 1740. Pope 1730–40. He condemned the Freemasons in 1738.

Clement XIII. (Carlo della Torre di Rezzonico). Born at Venice, March, 1693: died Feb., 1769. Pope 1758–69. He was elected through the influence of the Jesuits, in whose favor he issued a bull on their expulsion from Spain. His territories were overrun by France and Naples in 1768.

Clement XIV. (Giovanni Vincenzo Antonio Ganganelli). Born at St. Arcangelo, near Rimini, Italy, Oct. 31, 1705: died Sept. 22, 1774. Pope 1769–74. He suppressed the order of Jesuits by the brief "Dominus ac Redemptor noster" (1773), and founded the Clementine Museum at the Vatican.

Clément (klā-mon'), François. Born at Bèze, near Dijon, France, 1714: died March, 1793. A French historian, a Benedictine of Saint-Maur. He compiled from the tables of Maurice d'Antine the important chronological work "L'Art de vérifier les dates des faits historiques depuis la naissance de Jesus-Christ" (new revision and continuation by others, 1783–87).

Clément, Jacques, called Clemens non Papa to distinguish him from Pope Clement VI. Died before 1558. A once celebrated Flemish composer, principally of sacred music: chief chapel-master to the emperor Charles V.

Clément, Jacques. Born at Sorbon, Ardennes, France, about 1565: killed at St. Cloud, France, Aug. 1, 1589. A fanatical monk who assassinated Henry III., with the consent and aid of his religious superior and other members of the "League," Aug. 1, 1589. He was slain on the spot, and was honored as a martyr by the church.

Clément, Jean Pierre. Born at Draguignan, Var, France, June 2, 1809: died at Paris, Nov. 8, 1870. A French political economist and historian, member of the French Institute. His works include "Histoire de la vie et de l'administration de Colbert" (1846), "Le gouvernement de Louis XIV." (1848), "Jacques Cœur et Charles VII." (1853), etc.

Clement, Justice. A city magistrate in Ben Jonson's "Every Man in his Humour."

Clement (klā'ment), Knut Jungbohn. Born in Amrum, Schleswig, Dec. 4, 1803: died at Bergen, N. J., Oct. 7, 1873. A Danish historian, resident in the United States after 1866. He wrote "Die nordgermanische Welt" (1840), "Die Jesus- und Leidensgeschichte der Friesen" (1845), etc.

Clement (klem'ent) of Alexandria (Titus Flavius Clemens). Born, probably at Athens, about 150 A.D.: died in Palestine about 220. A father of the primitive church, head of the catechetical school at Alexandria 190–203, and one of the most noted of the founders of the Alexandrian school of theology.

Cleofas (klē'ō-fas), Don. A high-spirited Spanish student in Le Sage's novel "Le diable boiteux," somewhat akin to him the fortunes of the inmates of the houses of Madrid by unroofing them. See Asmodeus and Diable boiteux, Le.

Cléomadès (klā-ō-ma-dās'), Adventures of. An early French poem (about the end of the 13th century), also known as "Le chevalier de fust" ('the Wooden Horse'), by Adenès le Roi. Its central incident is the introduction of a wooden horse, like that in the "Arabian Nights," which transports its rider whithersoever he may go. The poem, notwithstanding its length (20,000 lines), enjoyed very great popularity.

Cleombrotus (klē-om'brō-tus) I. [Gr. Κλεόμβροτος.] Killed at Leuctra, 371 B. C. A king of Sparta 380–371. He waged war with the Thebans, and was defeated by them at Leuctra.

Cleomedes (klē-ō-me'dēz). [Gr. Κλεομήδης.] A Greek lecturer whose birthplace, epoch, and era are unknown. He wrote a treatise on astronomy and cosmography, entitled "The Circular Theory of the Heavenly Bodies," in which he maintains that the earth is spherical, that the number of the fixed stars is infinite, and that the moon's rotation on its axis is performed in the same time as its synodical revolution about the earth. His treatise contains also the first notice of the theory of atmospheric refraction.

Cleomenes (klē-om'ē-nēz) I. [Gr. Κλεομένης.] King of Sparta from about 519–491 B. C. He expelled Hippias from Athens in 510.

Cleomenes III. King of Sparta 236–220 B. C. He abolished the ephorate 225, waged war with the Achæan League and Macedonia 225–221, and was defeated at Sellasia 221.

Cleon (klē'on). [Gr. Κλέων.] Killed at Amphipolis, Macedon, 422 B. C. An Athenian demagogue. Coming forward shortly after the death of Pericles as leader of the democratic party, he violently opposed Nicias, the head of the aristocratic party, who advocated peace with Sparta and the conclusion of the Peloponnesian war. Having conducted a successful expedition against the Spartans in Pylos, he was in 424 intrusted with the command of an expedition destined to act against Brasidas in Chalcidice. He was defeated by the latter at Amphipolis, and fell in the fight. He was satirized by Aristophanes in the "Knights" (424), and in other plays.

Cleon. In Shakspere's "Pericles," the governor of Tharsus, burned to death to revenge the supposed murder of Marina.

Cléonte (klā-ōnt'). The lover of Lucille in Molière's comedy "Le bourgeois gentilhomme."

Cleopatra (klē-ō-pa'trā). [Gr. Κλεοπάτρα.] Born at Alexandria, Egypt, 69 B. C.: died at Alexandria, 30 B. C. The queen of Egypt 51–30 B. C., daughter of Ptolemy Auletes. She was joint ruler with her brother Ptolemy from 51 to 49, when she was expelled by him. Her reinstatement in it by Cæsar gave rise to war between Cæsar and Ptolemy. The latter was defeated and killed, and his younger brother was elevated to the throne in his stead. Cleopatra lived with Cæsar at Rome from 46 to 44, and had by him a son, Cæsarion, who was interested to put to death by Octavianus. She returned to Egypt on the murder of Cæsar, and in the civil war which ensued sided with the Triumvirate. Antony having been appointed ruler of Asia and the East, she visited him at Tarsus in 41, making a voyage of extraordinary splendor and magnificence up the Cydnus. She gained by this visit complete ascendancy over Antony. On her account he divorced his wife Octavia, the sister of Octavianus, in 32. Octavianus declared war against her in 31. The fleet of Antony and Cleopatra was defeated in the same year at the battle of Actium, which was decided by the flight of Cleopatra, who was followed by Antony. After the death of Antony, who killed himself on hearing a false report of her death, she poisoned herself to avoid being exhibited in Rome at the triumph of Octavianus. According to the popular belief, she applied to her bosom an asp that had been secretly conveyed to her in a basket of figs. She had three children by Antony. Besides extraordinary charms of person, she possessed an active and cultivated mind, and is said to have been able to converse in seven languages. Shakspere's portrait of her in his "Antony and Cleopatra" is one of the most extraordinary of his creations.

If Cleopatra's death had been caused by any serpent, the small viper would rather have been chosen than the large asp; but the story is disproved by her having decked herself in "the royal ornaments," and being found dead "without any mark of suspicion of poison on her body. Death from a serpent's bite could not have been mistaken; and her vanity would not have allowed her to choose one which would have disfigured her in so frightful a manner. Other poisons were well understood and easy of access, and no boy would have ventured to carry an asp in a basket of figs, some of which he even offered to the guards as he passed; and Plutarch (Vit. Anton.) shows that the story of the asp was doubted. Nor is the statue carried in Augustus' triumph which had an asp upon it any proof of his belief in it, since that snake was the emblem of Egyptian royalty; the statue (or the crown) of Cleopatra could not have been without one, and this was probably the origin of the whole story. [G. W.]

Rawlinson, Herod., II. 123, note.

Cleopatra's Needles. A pair of Egyptian obelisks of pink granite which were transported from Heliopolis to Alexandria in the eighth year of Augustus. One of them was taken to London and set up on the Thames embankment in 1878, and the other was soon after brought to New York and erected in Central Park. Each pier is 67 feet high to the sharp apex, and 7 feet 7 inches in diameter at the base. It stands on a massive cube of granite, on which it is supported by four great bronze crabs, imitating the ancient originals. It is covered on all its faces with deeply incised hieroglyphs which present the names of Thothmes III., Rameses II., and Seti II. (16th-14th centuries B. C.).

Cleopatre (klā-ō-pä'tr'). A play by Sardou (with Moreau). It was written for Sarah Bernhardt, and produced in 1890.

Cleophon (klē'ō-fon). [Gr. Κλεοφῶν.] Died 405 B. C. An Athenian demagogue, said to have been of Thracian origin. He opposed the oligarchical party, and successfully used his influence to prevent peace with Lacedæmon after the battles of Ægospotami (406), and Ægospotami (405). He was put to death in 405 by the Athenian council.

Cleopolis (klē-op'ō-lis). A name given by Spenser in his "Faerie Queene" to the city of London.

Cochrane, Thomas. Born at Annsfield, in Lanarkshire, Dec. 14, 1775: died at Kensington, England, Oct. 31, 1860. A British nobleman (tenth Earl of Dundonald) and British naval commander. He was appointed vice-admiral Nov. 23, 1841, admiral March 21, 1851, and rear-admiral of the United Kingdom Oct. 23, 1854. On May 6, 1809, in the Aquidy, a small and poorly armed vessel with 54 men, he captured the Spanish frigate Elgamo of 600 tons and 340 men. He entered Parliament in 1806. On April 11, 1809, he attacked a French fleet in Aix Roads, and destroyed four of the enemy's vessels. In Feb., 1814, Cochrane was accused of complicity in originating a fraudulent report of Napoleon's death for speculative purposes, and, though he claimed to have merely incurred the suspicion for a year, fined, and expelled from the navy and from the House of Commons. His constituents stood by him, and at once reelected him again to Parliament. He accepted an invitation to organize the infant navy of Chile; he reached Valparaiso Nov., 1818. During the subsequent campaign, with only one frigate and a few old vessels, he managed to neutralize the powerful Spanish squadron; took Valdivia in Jan., 1820; transported San Martin's army to Peru; blockaded Callao, and performed the feat of cutting out a Spanish frigate from under the guns of the castle (Nov. 5, 1820), and contributed greatly to the capture of Lima. Owing to quarrels with San Martin and the Chilian authorities, he resigned his command in 1822. In 1823 he entered the Brazilian navy: during this time he recovered Bahia and Maranhão from the Portuguese. Accused of participation, he resigned in 1825. In 1827 he took command of the Greek navy, but accomplished nothing. In 1832 he was virtually exonerated from the charges on which he had been imprisoned in 1814, and was restored to the Order of the Bath and to his rank in the British navy.

Cokayne (kō-kān'), Thomas. Born at Mapleton, Derbyshire, Jan. 21, 1587: died at London, 1638. An English lexicographer, author of an English-Greek lexicon containing derivations and definitions of all the words in the New Testament" (1658). He was educated at Oxford (Corpus Christi College), but did not take a degree. During the latter part of his life he lived in London under the name of Browne.

Coke (kōk, originally kāk), Sir Edward. [The surname Coke is another form (archaic spelling) of Cook, orig. designating a cook.] Born at Mileham, Norfolk, England, Feb. 1, 1552: died at Stoke Pogis, Sept. 3, 1634. A noted English jurist. He was speaker of the House of Commons 1592–93, attorney-general 1593–94, chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1606, and chief justice of the King's Bench 1613. He came into conflict with the king and Bacon on matters touching the royal prerogative, especially the right of granting commendams, and was removed from the bench Nov. 15, 1616. Among the noted cases which he conducted as prosecutor are those of Essex and Southampton in 1600, of Sir Walter Raleigh in 1603 (in which he disgraced himself by the brutality of his language), and of the gunpowder plotters in 1605. In the later part of his life he rendered notable service, in Parliament and elsewhere, to English freedom, his last important speech being a direct attack on Buckingham. His chief works are his "Reports" (1600–15) and his "Institutes" which consist of a reprint and translation of Littleton's "Tenures" with a commentary (popularly known as "Coke upon Littleton"); the text of various statutes from Magna Charta to the time of James I., with a commentary; a treatise on criminal law; and a treatise on the jurisdiction of the different law-courts.

An English nobleman and Whig politician, created earl of Leicester of Holkham and Viscount Coke Aug. 12, 1837. He was the son of Thomas Wenman, and assumed the name Coke on succeeding to the estate of his maternal uncle, Thomas Coke, earl of Leicester. He is best known for his improvements in agriculture on his estates about Holkham, Norfolk, especially in the breeds of cattle, sheep, and pigs.

Cokes (kōks), Bartholomew. A foolish young squire in Jonson's comedy "Bartholomew Fair."

Cokes is unquestionably the most finished picture of a simpleton that the mimetic art ever produced. With sufficient natural powers to take from us all sense of uneasiness at his exposure, he is forever wantoning on the verge of imbecility. His childish but insatiable curiosity, his eagerness to possess every object within his reach, his total abandonment of himself to every amusement that offers his incapacity of receiving more than one of two events at a time, with his anxious fears that the other will escape him, joined to the usual concomitants of folly, selfishness, cunning, and occasional fits of obstinacy.

Gifford, Notes to Jonson (Bartholomew Fair), II. 210.

Colada (kō-lä'THä). [Sp.] The second sword of the Cid.

Colburn, Zerah. Born at Cabot, Vt., Sept. 1, 1804: died at Norwich, Vt., March 2, 1840. An American, celebrated during his boyhood as an arithmetical prodigy.

Colby (kōl'bi) University. An institution of learning situated at Waterville, Maine. It was organized in 1820, and previous to 1867 was called Waterville College. It is under the control of the Baptists.

Colcampata (kōl-käm-pä'ta). [Quichua, 'terrace of the granaries.'] A series of artificial terraces at the foot of the Sacsahuamán hill, north of and overlooking the city of Cuzco, Peru. Under the Inca sovereigns they were a sort of sacred garden: every year the Inca himself broke the soil there as a signal that the season of planting had commenced, and the people followed the example of their chief. These ceremonies were celebrated by festivals. The Colcampata palace was at the base of the terraces. Its ruins still remain, and form a good state of preservation.

Colchester (kol'chester). A town in Essex, England, situated on the Colne in lat. 51° 54′ N., long. 0° 54′ E.: the Roman Camulodunum, and the Anglo-Saxon Colneceaster. It has long been famous for its oyster-fishery, and contains many Roman antiquities, including Roman walls. It has a ruined abbey church of St. Botolph's Priory, and of a Benedictine monastery. The castle is the most powerful Norman military structure in England. The dimensions of the keep are 168 by 126 feet, and its walls are 12 in thickness from 11 to 30 feet. In one portion of the walls appears Roman herring-bone work in brick. The chapel is now a museum of Roman antiquities. Camulodunum was the earliest Roman colony in Britain, and was destroyed by the Iceni, but rebuilt. Later it became a stronghold, and was taken by Fairfax in 1648. Population (1801), 24,530.

The grand city of Camulodunum, or, as it is called in the Britannic, Camulodunon, the capital of the British princes after they had submitted to the Romans, and the first Roman city in the island which was honoured with the rank of a colonia. History speaks of its temples and public buildings; and if, at an early period of its history, it was exposed to attack without walls of defence, that want was so well supplied at a subsequent period, that the ponderous masonry of its walls has endured to the present day, and ought never to have allowed anybody to hesitate in placing the site of this ancient city at Colchester.

Wright, Celt, p. 134.

Colchester, Baron. See Abbot, Charles.

Colchis (kol'kis). [Gr. Κολχίς.] In ancient geography, a country in Asia, lying between the Caucasus on the north, Iberia on the east, Armenia on the south, Pontus on the southwest, and the Euxine on the west: the modern Mingrelia. Coleridge, Samuel Taylor. Born at Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, England, Oct. 21, 1772: died at Highgate, London, July 25, 1834. An English poet, philosopher, and literary critic. He studied, with short interruption, at Cambridge 1791–94, when he left without a degree. Soon after this he formed, with Southey, George Burnett, and others, the project of establishing a communistic society on the Susquehanna River, a scheme which was never executed owing to want of funds. He married Sara Fricker, the sister of Southey's wife, in 1795; and in the same year settled at Bristol, where the first volume of his poems was published in 1796. He began in 1796 the publication of a weekly periodical, entitled "The Watchman," of which only ten numbers appeared. In 1798 he published, in conjunction with Wordsworth, the "Lyrical Ballads," contributing the "Ancient Mariner," the "Nightingale," and two scenes from "Osorio" (afterward "Remorse"). In 1798 he accepted an annuity of £150 from Messrs. Josiah and Thomas Wedgwood, and in the same year went to Germany, where he studied physiology and philosophy some months at the University of Gottingen. He returned to England in 1799, and in 1800 settled at Keswick, the home of Southey and Wordsworth. He was secretary to the governor of Malta 1804–05. Beginning, owing to domestic difficulties, aggravated by his habit of taking opium, he separated from his wife and went to London, where he lectured to fashionable audiences on Shakspere, the fine arts, and cognate subjects. In 1810 he became the guest of Mr. Gillman, a physician of London, in whose house he spent the rest of his life. Among his works are "Remorse, a Tragedy" (1813), "Christabel" (1816), "Biographia Literaria" (1817), "Aids to Reflection in the Formation of a Manly Character" (1825), etc. "Literary Remains" (edited by Henry Nelson Coleridge (1836–39), complete works edited by Shedd (1853–54).

Coligny, or Coligni (ko-lēn-yē' or ko-lēn'yē), Gaspard de. Born at Châtillon-sur-Loing, France, Feb. 16, 1517: killed at Paris, Aug. 24, 1572. A celebrated French general and Huguenot leader, son of Gaspard de Coligny, marshal of France. He was presented at the court of Francis I. by his uncle the constable Anne de Montmorency in 1537, was knighted by Condé on the field of Cérisolles in 1544, became admiral of France in 1552, and was taken prisoner of war by the Spaniards at St. Quentin in 1557. On his return to France he openly embraced Calvinism, and, taking advantage of his official position, made several attempts to establish colonies in America as places of refuge for the Huguenots, including the expedition of Jean Ribault in 1562 and that of Laudonnière in 1564. Civil war having broken out in 1562, he was chosen second in command of the Huguenot forces. The murder of the Prince of Condé after the battle of Jarnac (1569) placed him at the head of the Huguenot party until superseded by Henry of Navarre, in whose name he fought the disastrous battle of Moncontour the same year. His victory over the Catholics at Arnay-le-Duc June 27, 1570, led to the treaty of St. Germain, concluded Aug. 8, 1570. On the occasion of the marriage of Henry of Navarre with Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX., he visited Paris, where, although treated with apparent cordiality by the king, he was murdered in his chamber in the presence of the Duke of Guise, falling as the first victim of the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Coll (kol). An island of the Inner Hebrides, Argyllshire, Scotland, lying west of Mull. Length, 13 miles.

Colla (kōl'yä). [From the Indian tribe of the same name.] A province of the Inca empire of Peru, lying south of Cuzco, and embracing a portion of the Titicaca basin. It corresponded to the modern Collao (which see).

Collamer (kol'ą-mėr), Jacob. Born at Troy, N. Y., 1792: died at Woodstock, Vt., Nov. 9, 1865. An American politician, postmaster-general 1849–50, and United States senator from Vermont 1855–65.

Collao (kōl-yä'ō). A region in southern Peru, embracing the Peruvian portion of the Titicaca basin. The name is also extended to adjacent parts of Bolivia. The Collao consists of elevated plains and hilly ranges nowhere less than 12,000 feet above the sea. It is limited on the east and west by two great chains of the Andean system, and northward the Vilcanota crossrange separates it from the basin of Cuzco. The greater part of the Peruvian department of Puno is included in the Collao.

Collappohyea. See Calapooya.

Collas (kōl'yäz). An Indian tribe of Bolivia, now known as Aymarás (which see).

Colla-suyu (kol'yä-sō'yō). ['Region of the Colla.'] A name given by the Incas to the southern quarter of their empire, embracing the highlands of Bolivia, and Peru south of Cuzco.

Colle (kol'le). A small town in Tuscany, Italy, situated northwest of Siena.

Collé (kō-lā'), Charles. Born at Paris, 1709: died there, Nov. 3, 1783. A French song-writer and dramatist.

Colle (kol'le), Rafaello dal, or Rafaellino dal. Born at or near San Sepolcro, Tuscany, about 1490; died about 1540(?). An Italian painter, pupil of Raphael (whence his surname Rafaellino).

Colleen Bawn (kol'ēn bân), The, or The Brides of Garry-Owen. A play by Dion Boucicault, founded on Gerald Griffin's novel "The Collegians." It was first played on Sept. 10, 1860. A novel with this title was published in 1861. See Collegians, The.

Collège de France (ko-lăzh' dē frōns), or Collège Royal. An institution of learning founded by Francis I. in 1559. It was designed to promote the more advanced tendencies of the time, and to counteract the scholasticism of the university. It at first consisted of four chairs for instruction in Greek and Hebrew. Later were added medicine, mathematics, philosophy (in the reign of Henry II.), eloquence, botany, Arabic (Henry III.), and Syriac (Louis XIII.). In 1789 there were 18 chairs; in 1855 there were 24 chairs. There are about 40 at the present time. The College Royal, or Collège de France, was at first dependent upon the university for lectures-rooms. In 1610 a new building was commenced, which has been finished in the present century.

Collège Mazarin (ko-lăzh' mă-zä-ran'). A college in Paris, founded by Mazarin, March 6, 1661. He endowed it, and gave it his library of 40,000 volumes. The building was erected on the site of the Tour de Nesle by the architect Le Vau, and was finished in 1672. In 1674 the new college was incorporated in the university. Its object was the gratuitous instruction and sustenance of sixty sons of gentlemen living in the four newly acquired provinces, Figuerol, Alsace, La Flandre, and Roussillon; hence its name "Collège des Quatre Nations" (College of the Four Nations).

College of the Four Nations. See Collège Mazarin.

College of William and Mary. See William and Mary College.

Collegians (ko-lē'ji-anz), The. A novel by Gerald Griffin, issued anonymously in 1829. In 1861 it was dramatized, illustrated by Pritz, and called "The Colleen Bawn, or The Collegian's Wife." See Colleen Bawn.

Collegiants (ko-lē'ji-ants). A sect founded near Leyden, Holland, in 1619, the societies of which are called colleges. The sect spread rapidly in the Netherlands, and is maintained there and in Russia even. In doctrine and practice the Collegiants resemble the Quakers, having no creed or organized ministry; but they believe in the necessity of baptism, which they administer by immersion.

Colleoni (kol-lā-ō'nē), or Coleone (kō-lā-ō'ne), Bartolommeo. Born at Solza, near Bergamo, 1400; died Nov. 4, 1475. A noted Italian mercenary commander, the foremost tactician and disciplinarian of the 15th century. He was of an ancient and noble family which exercised a minor sovereignty over the province of Bergamo. He served in his youth under the principal condottieri or mercenary generals, of the time; and in wars between Milan and Venice followed his adopted city either side at discretion. The Visconti of Milan cast him into prison, and the Council of Ten at Venice conspired for his assassination. But he finally became generalissimo of the land forces of Venice, and retained this post until his death. He was a patron of the arts. The most notable works which celebrate his greatness are the statue by Verrocchio and Leopardi in Venice, the best equestrian statue in existence (see Verrocchio and Leopardi), the castle of Malpaga, near Bergamo, with its frescos; and the Colleoni chapel in the Città di Città at Bergamo, with the tombs of Bartolommeo and his daughter Medea. The statue by Verrocchio stands before San Giovanni e Paolo in Venice. It was cast in 1496, and is the second equestrian statue of the Italian Renaissance. It characterizes with striking naturalism the haughty and formidable mercenary soldier. The rich marble pedestal has Corinthian columns and entablature.

Collet (kol'et), John. Born at London about 1725; died at Chelsea, Aug. 6, 1780. An English painter, chiefly of humorous scenes from low life.

Colleton (kol'e-ton), James. Governor of South Carolina 1686–90. He received with his appointment the dignity of landgrave and 48,000 acres of land. He attempted in vain to enforce the recognition of Locke's constitution by the colonial parliament. He was deposed and banished by the colonists on the proclamation of William and Mary, 1690.

Colletta (kol-let'tä), Pietro. Born at Naples, Jan. 23, 1775; died at Florence, Nov. 11, 1833. A Neapolitan general. He was made intendant of Calabria by Murat in 1808, obtained the rank of general in 1812, was one of the leaders of the constitutional party under the Bourbons, and on the outbreak of the revolution of 1820 was sent as viceroy to Sicily. He was named minister of war in Feb., 1821, but was banished through Austrian intervention and retired to Florence. He wrote "Storia del reame di Napoli 1734–1825" (1834).

Colliberts. See Cagots.

Collier (kol'yėr), Arthur. Born at Langford Magna, Wiltshire, Oct. 12, 1680; died there, 1732. An English clergyman and metaphysical writer, rector of Langford after 1704. His chief work is his "Clavis Universalis, or a New Inquiry into Truth, being a Demonstration of the Non-existence or Impossibility of an External World" (1713), in which he propounds a subjective idealism closely resembling that of Berkeley.

Collier, Jeremy. Born at Stow-cum-Qui, Cambridgeshire, Sept. 23, 1650; died at London, April 26, 1726. An English nonjuring clergyman, celebrated as a controversialist. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1673, was rector of Ampton in Suffolk 1679–85, and removed to London in the latter year, where he was for some time lecturer at Gray's Inn. A political pamphlet in which he maintained that the withdrawal of the king was not an abdication, and that the throne was not vacant, caused his imprisonment for a short time in Newgate in 1688, and in 1692 he was again imprisoned, for political reasons. In 1696 he, with two other nonjuring clergymen, attended Sir John Friend and Sir William Parkyns (who were condemned to death as conspirators against the life of William) to the scaffold and absolved them, and, having concealed himself to avoid arrest, was outlawed (July 3). He wrote a large number of controversial pamphlets, a "Historical, Geographical Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary" (1701–21), a learned "Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain . . . to the End of the Reign of Charles II." (1708–14), and the famous "Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage" (1698). The last work was a vigorous attack upon the immorality of the contemporary drama, and produced a great impression, forcing from Dryden a confession of fault and a declaration of repentance, and involving Congreve and from other dramatists, and initiating a reformation.

Collier, John Payne. Born at London, Jan. 11, 1789; died at Maidenhead, Sept. 17, 1883. An English journalist, lawyer, and Shakspearian critic. He was a reporter for the "Times" 1809–10, and practised as lawyer, journalist, and literary critic, and editorial writer for the "Morning Chronicle" 1821–47. In 1847 he was appointed secretary of the royal commission on the British Museum, and continued in that office until 1850. He was knighted in Maidenhead. He published a new edition of Dodsley's "Old Plays" (1825–27), a "History of English Dramatic Poetry and Annals of the Stage" (1831), an edition of Shakspeare (1842–44), "Shakespeare's Library" (1844), "A Booke of Roxburghe Ballads" (1847), "Extracts from the Registers of the Stationers' Company" (1848–49), "The Dramatic Works of Thomas Heywood" (1850–51), "The Works of Edmund Spenser" (1862), a "Biographical and Critical Account of the Rarest Books in the English Language" (1865), "Old Ballads from Early Vellum Ages" (1870), and an edition of Shakspeare (1875–78). His able and useful work on the older English literature is marred and brought into discredit by a series of literary frauds which he committed, of which the most notable is his use and defense of spurious annotations "by a seventeenth century hand" which he professed to have found on the margin of a copy of the second folio Shakspere originally belonging to one "Thomas Perkins," and since known as the "Perkins Folio."

Colline Gate (kol'in gāt). [L. porta collina.] A gate at the northeastern extremity of ancient Rome. Near here, Nov., 82 B. C., Sulla defeated the Samnites under Pontius.

Collingwood (kol'ing-wūd). Cuthbert. Born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sept. 26, 1750: died at sea near Port Mahon, Balearic Islands, March 7, 1810. A noted English admiral, created Lord Collingwood in 1805. He was appointed lieutenant for his services, with a party of seamen, at Bunker Hill, was promoted to commander (succeeding Nelson) in 1779; served with distinction in command of the Excellent in the battle off Cape St. Vincent (Feb. 14, 1797); became rear-admiral in 1799, with a command in the Channel fleet, and vice-admiral in 1804; was second in command at the battle of Trafalgar; and on Nelson's death, in that action, succeeded to the chief command.

Collingwood. A lake port in Simcoe County, Ontario, Canada, situated on Georgian Bay, Lake Huron, 72 miles northwest of Toronto. Population (1891), 4,940.

Collingwood. A northeastern suburb of Melbourne, Australia.

Collins (kol'inz), Anthony. Born at Heston or Isleworth, Middlesex, London, June 21, 1676; died at London, Dec. 13, 1729. A noted English deist, a disciple and friend of John Locke. He published "An Essay Concerning the Use of Reason" (1707), "Priestcraft in Perfection" (1709), a "Discourse on Freethinking" (1713), "A Philosophical Inquiry Concerning Human Liberty" (1715), "A Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion" (1724), etc.

Collins, Charles Allston. Born at Hampstead, near London, Jan. 25, 1828: died at London, April 9, 1873. An English painter (of the Preraphaelite school) and writer, brother of William Wilkie Collins. He married the younger daughter of Charles Dickens.

Collins, John. Born at Bath, England, about 1742: died at Birmingham, England, May 2, 1808. An English actor and poet.

Collins, Mortimer. Born at Plymouth, England, June 29, 1827: died at Knowl Hill, Berkshire, July 28, 1876. An English novelist, poet, and miscellaneous writer. He was mathematical master of Queen Elizabeth's College, Guernsey, 1850(?)–56, and after 1862 was occupied with literary work at his residence at Knowl Hill. He published "Idyls and Rhymes" (1865), "Sweet Anne Page" (1868), "The Inn of Strange Meetings, and Other Poems" (1871), "The Secret of Long Life" (1871), etc.

Collins, Rev. Mr. A character in Jane Austen's novel "Pride and Prejudice." He is a self-conceited toady.

Collins, William. Born at Chichester, England, Dec. 25, 1721: died there, June 12, 1759. An English poet. He was the son of a latter who was twice mayor of Chichester. Studied at Winchester and at Oxford, where he was graduated B. A. Nov. 18, 1743; and about 1745 went to London to follow literature as a profession. The later years of his life were obscured by insanity. He published "Persian Eclogues" (1742; republished as "Oriental Eclogues," 1757), "Odes" (1746), etc. His works have been edited by J. Langhorne (1765), Mrs. Barbauld (1797), A. Dyce (1827), and others.

Collins, William. Born at London, Sept. 5, 1788: died at London, Feb. 17, 1847. A noted English landscape and figure painter, father of William Wilkie Collins.

Collins, William Wilkie. Born at London, Jan. 8, 1824: died there, Sept. 23, 1889. An English novelist, son of William Collins (1788–1847): author of "The Dead Secret" (1857), "The Woman in White" (1860), "No Name" (1862), "Armadale" (1866), "The Moonstone" (1868), "The New Magdalen" (1873), "Man and Wife" (1870), etc. "No Thoroughfare," in collaboration with Charles Dickens, appeared as a Christmas story in 1867.

Collinson (kol'in-son), James. Born at Mansfield, Nottinghamshire, about 1825: died April, 1881. An English painter, one of the original members of the Preraphaelite Brotherhood, which he abandoned about 1850. His work was unimportant.

Collioure (ko-lyōr'). A town in the department of Pyrénées-Orientales, France, situated on the Mediterranean 15 miles southeast of Perpignan. It has a castle and considerable trade in cork. Population (1891), commune, 3,411.

Cölln (kėln), Georg Friedrich Wilibald Ferdinand von. Born at Orlinghausen, Lippe, Germany, 1766: died at Berlin, May 31, 1820. A German publicist. His works include "Vertraute Briefe," etc. (1807–09), "Neue Feuerbrände" (1807–08), etc.

Collombet (kol-lōn-bā'), François Zénon. Born at Siéges, Jura, France, March 28, 1808: died at Lyons, Oct. 16, 1853. A French Roman Catholic historian and littérateur. He wrote "Histoire de St. Jérôme" (1844), and many other historical and critical works.

Collop Monday (kol'op mun'dā). The day before Shrove Tuesday: named from the custom of eating collops of salted meat and eggs on that day.

Colloredo (kol-lō-rā'dō). Rudolf von. Born Nov. 2, 1585: died Jan. 24, 1657. An Austrian general in the Thirty Years' War. As field-marshal of the imperial army he successfully defended Prague against the Swedes in 1648.

Colloredo-Mansfeld (kol-lō-rā'dō-mäns'feld), Hieronymus, Count von. Born at Wetzlar, Germany, March 30, 1775: died at Vienna, July 23, 1822. An Austrian general, distinguished in the campaign of 1813.

Colloredo-Mels (mels) und Waldsee (vält'sā), Count Joseph Maria von. Born at Regensburg, Bavaria, Sept. 11, 1735: died Nov. 26, 1818. An Austrian general. He fought with distinction in the Seven Years' War, and was minister of state and conference, and director of the council of war 1809–09.

Collot-d'Herbois (ko-lō'der-bwä'), Jean Marie. Born at Paris about 1750; died in Cayenne, South America, Jan. 8, 1796. A French actor and revolutionist, notorious for his brutality. He was deputy to the Convention in 1792, and a member of the Committee of Public Safety in 1793. In Nov., 1793, he was sent with Fouché to Lyons, by Robespierre, and executed his commission with great cruelty. An unsuccessful attempt upon his life was made May 23, 1794. Having become hostile to Robespierre, he joined the successful conspiracy against him (9 Thermidor), but was nevertheless expelled from the Convention (April, 1795) and transported. He published "Almanach du père Gérard" (1792).

Collyer (kol'yėr), Joseph. Born at London, Sept. 14, 1748: died Dec. 24, 1827. A noted English engraver, member of the Royal Academy, and engraver to Queen Charlotte.

Collyer, Robert. Born at Keighley, Yorkshire, England, Dec. 8, 1823. An American Unitarian clergyman. He was apprenticed to a blacksmith about 1837, emigrated to the United States in 1850; settled at Shoemakertown, Pennsylvania, where he followed the trade of a hammer-maker; joined the Unitarian Church in 1859; became a missionary to Chicago, where in 1860 he founded the Unity Church; and in 1879 became pastor of the Church of the Messiah in New York city. He wrote "Nature and Life" (1866), "The Life that Now is" (1871), etc.

Colman (kōl'man), George, the elder. Born at Florence, Italy, 1732; died at Paddington, London, Aug. 14, 1794. An English dramatist. His father, who was envoy at the court of Tuscany, died in 1733, and his mother then brought him to London. William Pulteney, afterward Earl of Bath, undertook the charge of him and sent him to Westminster School. He went to Oxford, where he was graduated from Christ Church in 1755, and, having been previously entered at Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar in the same year. An intimacy with Garrick and a natural taste for literature interfered with his legal work, and he produced a number of plays (at first anonymously) with the assistance of Garrick, who played in them. In connection with the latter he wrote "The Clandestine Marriage," and a coolness arose between them as to Garrick's part in the same. In 1767, having received two successions of fortune, he bought a fourth share in the Covent Garden Theatre. This completely alienated Garrick, and annoyed his friends, who wished him to continue in the law. He became acting manager. In 1774 he resigned the management, and in 1776, having been recalled to Garrick, he bought the Haymarket Theatre from Foote. In 1776 he had a stroke of paralysis, and finally grew so feeble in mind that he was put under restraint at Paddington, where he died. He brought out alterations of many old plays, most of which were successful. Among his own plays are "Polly Honeycomb" (1760), "The Jealous Wife" (1761), "The Clandestine Marriage" (with Garrick, in 1766). In 1778 he brought out an edition of Beaumont and Fletcher. His dramatic and miscellaneous works have never been completely collected.

Colman, George, the younger. Born Oct. 21, 1762: died at London, Oct. 26, 1836. An English dramatist, son of G. Colman the elder. He took charge of the Haymarket when his father's health failed, but he became involved in pecuniary difficulties and was obliged to live within the rules of the King's Bench. He was released by George IV., who appointed him lieutenant of the Yeomen of the Guard, a dignity which he sold. The lord chamberlain made him examiner of plays, in which position he was extremely illiberal. Among his best-known plays are "The Heir-at-Law" (1797), "John Bull" (1805), "The Heir-at-Law" (1808). He also wrote a good deal of popular humorous poetry, including "My Nightcap and Slippers" (1797), "Broad Grins" (1802), and "Poetical Vagaries" (1812). He frequently wrote under the name of "Arthur Griffinhoofe."

Colman, Samuel. Born at Portland, Maine, 1832. An American landscape-painter, a pupil of Durand.

Colmar (kōl-mär'), or Kolmar (kol'mär). The capital of the district of Upper Alsace, Alsace-Lorraine, situated on the Lauch 39 miles southwest of Strasburg. It contains a museum (formerly a Dominican monastery), and has large manufactures of cotton. It was formerly a free imperial city, was taken by the French in 1673; was ceded to them in 1678; and after the Revolution was made the capital of the department of Haut-Rhin. In 1871 it again became a German city. Population (1890), commune, 20,389.

Colne (kōln). A town in Lancashire, England, 26 miles north of Manchester. It formerly manufactured woolen goods, an industry which has given place to cotton manufacture. Population (1891), including Marsden, 16,774.

Colney Hatch (kōl'ni hach). A village in Middlesex, about 6 miles north of London, in which is the Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, founded in 1851.

Colocolo (kō-lō-kō'lō). Born about 1500: killed in the battle of Lomaco, Oct., 1561 (according to some authorities, he died about 1700). An Araucanian chief of southern Chile, celebrated in the "Araucana" of Ercilla. Probably Ercilla's verses gave him undue prominence.

Colocotronis. See Kolokotronis.

Cologna-Veneta (kō-lōn'yä-vā-nā'tä). A town in the province of Verona, Italy, 20 miles southeast of Verona.

Cologne (kō-lōn'), G. Köln (kōln). 1. The capital of the government district of Cologne, situated on the west bank of the Rhine in lat. 50° 57′ N., long. 6° 57′ E.: the Roman Colonia Agrippina. It is the largest city of the Rhine Province, a fortress of the first class, the center of the Rhine trade, and one of the principal commercial places in Germany. It has manufactures of eau de Cologne, sugar, tobacco, etc. The principal objects of interest are, besides the cathedral (see below), the Rheinstrasse, the Iron Bridge, the Municipal and Archiepiscopal Museums, the Museum of Industrial Art, the Rathaus (Hansa-haal: see below), the monument of Frederick William III., and the churches of the Minorites, (see St. Martin, St.), Maria Capitol, St. George, St. Severin, St. Peter, St. Cecilia, Apostles, St. Pantaleon, St. Gereon, St. Ursula (see below), St. Andreas, Jesuits, and St. Unalbert. The cathedral, one of the great buildings of the world, was begun in 1248 on the site of an earlier church, and was completed only in 1880, after being wholly neglected for the 14th century until 1823. Its design was inspired by the cathedral of Amiens, and all that is best in its architecture is French, while the less admirable features are indigenous. The cathedral has double aisles, with polygonal chevet projecting transepts, and two enormous towers and spires at the west end. These, with the façade, have been completed according to the original design of the 14th century, which still exists. The towers and spires are so huge as to dwarf the vast cathedral. The façade has three great gabled portals filled with sculpture, and two tiers of huge canopied and traceried windows, to which the towers add two more stages beneath the springing of the spires. The effect is somewhat mechanical, and inferior to the best French façades. The transept-façades are of modern design, with rich tracery and arcading, and triple portals, sculptured and canopied. The upper part is too narrow, and its elaborate tracery does not fill the place of the great roses of French churches. The interior is exceedingly impressive: it is notable for its splendid glass, much of it modern, but much of the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. The fine choir-stalls are of the 15th century. The canopied statues supported on consoles on the pillars of the nave are architecturally a defect. The choir-chapels are of great beauty, and contain some admirable paintings and sculptures. The cathedral is 468 feet long; its area, 91,464 square feet. The nave is 48 feet wide and 145 high. The western spires measure 511 feet, and are the loftiest church spires existing. There is a comparatively small central spire. The Rathaus, or town hall, is an interesting monument built between the 14th and 16th centuries on Roman foundations. The main structure is of the 14th century, battlemented, with high roof and traceried windows; the picturesque tower and low spire are of the 15th. The Renaissance portico, in five arcaded stages with engaged Corinthian columns, is an admirable example of the local architectural development. The great Hansa-Saal is adorned with good statues of the rulers of the Hansa, and with the undraped arms of patricians, burgomasters, and gilds. The Church of St. Ursula is a very early foundation in honor of the 11,000 martyred virgins, but was remodeled. The simple façade of 1692 has recently been restored to its original form. There are curious old paintings of the legend of the virgins; and in the treasury, whose walls are covered with elaborate patterns painted in the bones of the dead, are shown also the beautiful Romanesque shrine of St. Ursula, and a great number of other reliquaries in the form of female heads and busts. Cologne was an ancient town of the Ubii, Oppidum Ubiorum, and a Roman colony founded by Agrippina in 51 or 50 A. D. Later it belonged to the Frankish empire, and in the 13th century became a Hanseatic town, and one of the principal commercial centers in Germany. It was a free imperial city, and is noted in the development of German architecture and painting. It was taken by the French in 1794, and was granted to Prussia in 1815. Population (1890), 197,081; of commune, 281,681.

2. A government district in the Rhine Province, Prussia. Population (1890), 826,827.

Cologne, Electorate of. A former archbishopric and ecclesiastical principality of the Empire. It extended mainly along the left bank of the Rhine, north and south of Cologne. It was made an archbishopric by Charles the Great in 785, acquired the duchy of Westphalia in 1180, included one of the seven electorates by the Golden Bull, and was secularized in 1801. In 1801 the portion on the left bank of the Rhine became French territory: that on the right was divided in 1803 to Hesse-Darmstadt, etc. The larger part was granted to Prussia 1814–15.

Cologne, Three Kings of. In medieval legend, the three magi who followed the Star of Bethlehem from the East to lay gifts before the infant Jesus. Their names were Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar. It is claimed that their bodies were deposited in Cologne Cathedral. "The three days after New Year's day bear their names in the calendar, and their memory is preserved in the feast of the three holy Kings—the Epiphany." Chambers.

Colomb (ko-lōn'), or Columb, Michel. Born at Saint-Paul-de-Léon, in Bretagne, about 1440: died 1512. The first great sculptor of the French Renaissance. At a very early age he went to Dijon. He settled at Tours in 1481. In 1497 he executed in Carrara XI. an order for a bas-relief destined for the Abbaye of Saint-Michel-en-l'Herme, destroyed in 1569. His most important work is the tomb of Francis II., duke of Bretagne, and his wife, Marguerite de Foix, begun about 1502 by the order of Anne, queen of Louis XII., and finished in 1507. It is now in the cathedral of Nantes.

Colomba (ko-lōn'bä). A story by Prosper Mérimée, published in 1841.

Colombey (ko-lōn-bā'). A place in Lorraine 4½ miles east of Metz. Near it occurred the battle of Colombey-Nouilly, Aug. 14, 1870, in which the Germans under Steinmetz checked the French under Bazaine. The German loss was 4,906; that of the French, 3,698. Also called battle of Courcelles, and of Borny.

Colombia (kō-lōm'bē-ä). The name was first given in 1819 to what is now Venezuela. It was proposed by General Francisco Miranda. It was afterward extended to the confederation of Venezuela, New Granada, and Quito, and was dropped when the union was dissolved. Later the old region of New Granada renewed the name.

Colombia, Republic of. [Formerly United States of Colombia, Sp. Estados Unidos de Colombia; named after Columbus (Colombo).] The republic of South America, lying between the Caribbean Sea on the north, Venezuela and Brazil on the east, Ecuador on the south, and the Pacific Ocean and Costa Rica on the west. It is traversed by the Andes, and is rich in agricultural and mineral products, the chief river being the Magdalena and the affluents of the Amazon and Orinoco. Among its chief products are gold, silver, and coffee. The prevailing language is Spanish, and the prevailing religion Roman Catholic. It is divided into nine departments: Antioquia, Bolívar, Boyacá, Cauca, Cundinamarca, Magdalena, Panama, Santander, Tolima. Its capital is Bogotá. The government is representative, the executive being vested in a president, and the legislative in a senate and chamber of representatives. The Spanish power was established here in the first half of the 16th century, and independence was proclaimed in 1811. In 1819 this territory, with Venezuela and Ecuador, formed the Republic of Colombia, from which Venezuela withdrew in 1829 and Ecuador in 1830. In 1832 the republic of New Granada was founded, in 1863 the name "United States of Colombia" was adopted, and in 1886 the present constitution was formed. Area, 504,773 square miles. Population, 3,878,600.

Colombo (kō-lom'bō). A seaport and the capital of Ceylon, situated on the western coast in lat. 6° 55′ N., long. 79° 55′ E. It was fortified by the Portuguese in 1517, was taken from them by the Dutch in 1656, was ceded to the British in 1796, and is now an important coaling-station. Population (1891), 126,926.

Colonna (kō-lon'nä). A promontory at the southeastern extremity of Attica, Greece: the ancient Sunium.

Colonna (kō-lon'nä), Fabio, L. Fabius Columna. Born at Naples, 1567: died at Naples about 1640–50. A Neapolitan scholar and botanist, author of various botanical works. He is considered the creator of genera in botany.

Colonna, Fabrizio. Died at Naples, 1520. An Italian military leader, lord high constable of Naples.

Colonna, Marco Antonio. Born 1535: died Aug. 1, 1584. An Italian commander, duke of Paliano. He commanded the papal contingent in 1571 at the battle of Lepanto, in which the allied Spanish, Venetian, and papal fleets under Don John of Austria gained a decisive victory over the Turks. He was viceroy of Sicily when he died.

Colonna, Prospero. Born 1452: died 1523. An Italian general. He commanded the united imperial and papal forces in Lombardy against Francis I. of France 1521, and in conjunction with Georg von Freundsberg defeated Marshal Lautrec at Bicoque 1522.

Colonna, Vittoria. Born at Marino, near Rome, 1490: died at Rome, Feb. 25, 1547. A celebrated Italian poet. She was the daughter of Fabrizio Colonna, grand constable of Naples, by his marriage with Agnesina di Montefeltro, daughter of Federigo, duke of Urbino. She was betrothed in her infancy and old to a boy of the same age, the only son of the Marchese di Pescara. In their nineteenth year they were married at Ischia. A romantic story tells how the wife survived him twenty-two years, spent partly at Ischia, in convents at Orvieto and Viterbo, and, finally, in semi-monastic seclusion at Rome. She was the center of a group of celebrated men of letters and artists, of whom the foremost was Michelangelo. Her poems consisted mainly of sonnets to the memory of her husband, or on sacred and moral subjects. Michelangelo preserved a large number of them, and composed several madrigals and sonnets under her influence. Vittoria is the only woman who is known to have touched the heart of that great sculptor.

Colonsay (kol'on-sā). An island of the Inner Hebrides, in the county of Argyllshire, Scotland, situated west of Jura and north of Islay. It is noted for its ecclesiastical antiquities. Length, 8 miles.

Colonus (kō-lō'nus), The White Hill of, or Kolonos Hippios (kō-lō'nos hip'i-os). A site about 1½ miles northwest of Athens, north of the Academy on the banks of the Cephissus. It is the birthplace of Sophocles, and is immortalized by his description in the "Œdipus at Colonus." Upon the hill now stand the tomb of two noted archæologists, Otfried Muller and Charles Lenormant.

Colophon (kol'ō-fon). [Gr. Κολοφών.] In ancient geography, an Ionian city in Lydia, Asia Minor, situated near the coast 9 miles northwest of Ephesus.

Colorado (kol-ō-rä'dō). [Named from the Colorado River.] One of the United States of North America, lying between Wyoming and Nebraska on the north, Nebraska and Kansas on the east, Indian Territory and New Mexico on the south, and Utah on the west. It is traversed by the Rocky Mountains in the west, the foothills of which form the center, and the east is characterized by the "Great Plains." Its leading industries are mining (gold, silver, lead, etc.) and stock-raising, and it is noted as a health-resort. In the production of silver and lead it ranks as the first State of the Union. It has 55 counties, sends 2 senators and 2 representatives to Congress, and has 4 electoral votes. Capital, Denver. Its territory formed part of the Louisiana purchase and part of that acquired from Mexico. Gold was discovered in 1858; the Territory was organized in 1861, and was admitted as a State in 1876. Called the Centennial State. Area, 103,925 square miles. Population (1890), 412,198.

Colorado, Sp. Rio Colorado [Sp., 'colored' (i. e. red) 'river.'] 1. A river formed by the union of the Grand and Green rivers in southeastern Utah. It flows through Utah and Arizona, and separates Arizona from Nevada and California. It empties into the Gulf of California, in Lower California, about lat. 32° N. It is famous for its canons, of which the most celebrated, the Grand Canon, situated near the lower course of the river, and explored by the Powell survey expedition in 1869, has walls from 4,000 to 6,000 feet in height. Length (from source of Green River), about 2,000 miles; navigable to Callville, 612 miles. Also called Colorado of the West.

2. A river in Texas which flows into Matagorda Bay near Matagorda. Length, about 900 miles; navigable, except in summer, to Austin. Called the Eastern Colorado.—3. A river in the Argentine Confederation which flows into the Atlantic Ocean about lat. 39° 50′ S., long. 62° 10′ W. Length, about 620 miles.

Colorado Springs (kol-ō-rä′dō springz). The capital of El Paso County, Colorado, situated 64 miles south of Denver. It is a place of summer resort, near the foot of Pike's Peak. Population (1890), 11,140.

Colossæ (kō-los′ē). [Gr. Kolossai.] In ancient geography, a city in southwestern Phrygia, Asia Minor, situated on the Lycus. It was the seat of a primitive Christian church.

Colossæ has been generally supposed to have been situated at Chonös, the ancient Chonæ, with which Constantine Porphyrogenitus identifies it (de Thenat. i. 5, p. 24). Mr. Hamilton, however, seems to have discovered the true site, at the distance of three miles from Chonös, in the plain, on the banks of the Lycus (Tchorük).
Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 34, note.

Colosseum (kol-o-sē′um), or Flavian Amphitheater. [L. Colosseum: said to be named from the colossal statue of Nero which stood near it in the Via Sacra.] An amphitheater in Rome, begun by Vespasian (T. Flavius Sabinus) in 72 A. D., and for 400 years the seat of gladiatorial shows. The axes of this edifice of amphitheaters are 617 and 512 feet; of the arena, 282 and 177 feet. The exterior was ornamented with four tiers of engaged columns with their entablatures, the lower three inclosing arches, and the highest walled up, with square windows in every second intercolumniation. The material of the interior is stone, of the outer passages and vaults brick and concrete. The interior was faced with marble. In the substructions there is a most elaborate system of chambers, passages, dens, and drains. Despite the enormous mass of the existing ruin, it is estimated that two thirds have been carried away in the middle ages and later as building-material.

Columbine (kol′um-bīn). A conventional character in old Italian comedy, first appearing about 1560: the daughter of Pantaloon, or sometimes her coquettish maid-servant. She was the object of Harlequin's adoration, and so appears in English pantomime.

Columbretes (kō-lōm-brā′tes). A group of small volcanic rocks in the Mediterranean, east of Spain, in lat. 39° 54′ N., long. 0° 43′ E.

Columbus (kō-lum′bus). Bartholomew, Sp. Bartolomeo Colon. Born probably in Genoa about 1445: died at Santo Domingo, May, 1515. A brother of Christopher Columbus. He was with Bartholomew Diaz on the West African coast, and went to England in 1488 to interest Henry VII. in his brother's project. He returned to Spain in 1496, after the admiral had sailed on his second voyage, but followed him in command of a supply fleet, arriving at Isabella in June, 1498. The admiral made him adelantado, and from 1496 to 1498 he governed the island during his brother's absence. From 1498 to 1500 he suppressed with energy a revolt, marched to Xaragua in 1497; and in 1498 had the first trouble with Roldan. In 1500 Bobadilla sent him a prisoner to Spain, where he was released with the admiral. He was with his brother on the fourth voyage, 1502–04, and was the leader where active work was required. In the struggle with Porras at Jamaica he was wounded. He was with his brother both in Spain and in Rome, and in 1509 he accompanied Diego Columbus to Hispaniola, where he held important and lucrative offices.

Columbus, Christopher. [It. Cristoforo Colombo, Sp. Cristoval Colon, F. Christophe Colomb, L. Christophorus Columbus.] Born at or near Genoa, Italy, probably in 1446: died at Valladolid, Spain, May 20 or 21 (O. S.), 1506. The discoverer of America. His parents were wellconducted but he was early well educated, and early began to follow the sea. In 1473 (?) he went to Portugal, where he married and had a son, Diego, he also lived in the island of Porto Santo, near Madeira. It is probable that he joined in some of the Portuguese explorations on the African coast; and there is some doubtful evidence of a voyage made to Iceland. Impressed with the idea, founded on the known rotundity of the earth, that Asia might be reached by sailing westward, he proposed to the Portuguese king to make an expedition in that direction. Failing, he went to Spain (1484?) and offered the enterprise to Ferdinand and Isabella. He was repeatedly put off with promises or rebuffed by adverse reports of those set to inquire into these plans, and lived in poverty. His brother was sent to seek aid of Henry VII. of England (1488), and Columbus himself was about passing to France when he obtained a personal interview with the sovereigns at Granada. The excessive grants and honors which he demanded in case of success led to a refusal; but as he was about leaving Granada his friends made a last effort with the queen, he was recalled, and on April 17, 1492, the king and queen signed a paper in which all the demands of Columbus were agreed to. He was made, for himself and heirs, admiral in all the regions which he might discover, and viceroy in countries acquired by him for Spain, with full powers and a generous share in the revenues. Partly with royal aid, partly with the help of the Pinzons, merchants of Palos, three small vessels were fitted out, the Santa Maria as flagship, and the Niña and Pinta, commanded respectively by Vicente Yañez Pinzon and Martin Alonzo Pinzon. With these and 120 (or 90?) men Columbus left Palos Aug. 3, 1492. He touched at the Canaries, thence steered west, and on Oct. 7 (O. S., 12), or Oct. 22 (N. S.), discovered the island of Guanahani or San Salvador, one of the Bahamas, but which one is uncertain. He landed and took possession of it, and had some intercourse with the natives, and sailed on, discovering various islands and coasting part of the northern side of Cuba (Oct. 28–Dec. 22), and Haiti or Hispaniola, everywhere treating amicably with the natives, and obtaining small quantities of gold and island products. All these lands he supposed were outlying parts of Asia. The Santa Maria was wrecked on the Haitian coast, and he left there a colony of 40 men, building a fort called La Navidad in the land of a friendly chief. On Jan. 4, 1493, he started to return to the Niña. He narrowly escaped wreck in severe storms, parted company with the Pinta, touched at the Azores and in Portugal, where he was called to see the king; and finally reached Palos, March 15 (O. S.), 1493. Called to court, he was received with great honor, his privileges confirmed, and ample means given for a new expedition. He again embarked at Palos, Sept. 25, 1493, with 17 vessels and 1,200 men; discovered Dominica Nov. 3; landed on several of the Caribbee Islands and had encounters with the Caribs; reached Puerto Rico Nov. 22, and finally the harbor of La Navidad. He found that his colony had all been killed by hostile Indians. On a new site, farther east, he founded Isabella (Dec. 6, 1493), the European town in the New World. After some explorations in the interior he made an expedition westward (April 1494) in which he coasted the south side of Cuba (supposed by him to be a peninsula of Asia), and after discovering Jamaica returned to Isabella, Sept. 29, 1494. Ill treatment by the Spaniards caused insurrection of the Indians, but Columbus defeated them in a battle on the Vega Real, April 25, 1495. Shortly before he had proposed a plan for enslaving hostile Indians, for which he has been much blamed. There was much suffering and discontent among the colonists, and some of them went to Spain to make complaints; they were supported by Bishop Fonseca, an enemy of Columbus, who was at the head of colonial affairs; and in 1495 Juan Aguado was sent as a royal commissioner to Española. He collected complaints against the admiral, who, fearing the effect of the report, returned to Spain at the same time with Aguado (March, 1496), leaving his brothers in charge. He was well received by the sovereigns, and the charges dismissed. After much delay he sailed on his third voyage (May 30, 1498), in which he kept farther south, discovered Trinidad (July 31), and the lowlands at the mouth of the Orinoco (Aug. 1), this being, in all probability, the first discovery of the continent of South America: the Cabots had already seen North America. With much difficulty he passed the two straits between Trinidad and the mainland, and was convinced that the Indies were not from a continental (Asiatic) river. In a report at this time he argues that the earth is pear-shaped and the highest land at the head of this river, where also the terrestrial paradise is; this, and some other later reports, have been supposed to indicate temporary aberration of mind, caused by sickness. On Aug. 30 he reached Isabella, to find that the land been founded during his absence. Some of the colonists, under Roldan, had rebelled, and Columbus was forced to make a degrading peace with them. Disorders continued, and on Aug. 23, 1500, Francisco de Bobadilla arrived as royal commissioner. He deposed Columbus and his brothers and sent them in chains to Spain (Oct., 1500); they were at once released, but Columbus failed to obtain a reinstatement in his dignities; and only after much delay he obtained four caravels for a final exploration, in which, if again he failed to find a passage through the globe. Leaving Spain March, 1502, he touched at Santo Domingo, then sailed to Central America, discovering Honduras (May 30), and coasted to the isthmus of Panama, seeking for a passage westward. After encounters with the Indians and a vain attempt to plant a colony (Feb., 1503), he returned to Jamaica. There his ships were eaten and destroyed by worms, gave out, and he and his men remained on the island, enduring great sufferings: some rebelled, and were subdued after a hard fight. A canoe sent out reached Española, and at length (June, 1504) ships were sent to take them off. Columbus reached Spain Nov. 7, 1504. Queen Isabella, who had always befriended him, died soon after. His repeated petitions for reinstatement had no effect, and he passed his remaining days in poverty and neglect. He never knew that the regions discovered by him constituted a new continent, always supposing them to be portions of Asia.

Columbus, Diego, It. Giacomo Colombo; by Latin writers called Jacobus. Probably born at Genoa about 1450: date and place of death unknown. A brother of Christopher Columbus, who accompanied him in the second voyage (1493), and was at times left in command at Isabella or Santo Domingo. He was sent to Spain with his brothers in 1500, and about that time became a priest. In 1509 he accompanied his nephew to Santo Domingo, and probably died soon after.

Columbus, Sp. Colon, Diego. Born probably at Lisbon about 1476: died at Montalvan, near Toledo, Feb. 23, 1526. A son of Christopher Columbus. In 1492 Queen Isabella made him a page at the Spanish court, where he remained until after his father's death. He was confirmed in 1509 as admiral of the Indies and governor of Hispaniola, but without the title of viceroy. He arrived at Santo Domingo, July 10, 1509; but the conflicting claims of jurisdiction, and dissatisfaction with his rule, soon made the position an uncasy one. Velasquez, whom he sent to conquer Cuba in 1511, virtually threw off his authority: the establishment of a royal audience at Santo Domingo restricted his power; and though, in a visit to Spain, he obtained new favors (1520), he was finally called back by the Council of the Indies in 1523 to answer charges against him. His wife was left in charge of the government; but Diego followed the court, vainly seeking redress, until his death.

Columbus, Ferdinand, Sp. Ferdinando Colon. Born in Cordova, Aug. 15, 1488; died at Seville, July 12, 1539. An illegitimate son of Christopher Columbus and Doña Beatrix Henriquez, a lady of Cordova. He was made page of Queen Isabella in 1498, was with his father on the fourth voyage, 1502–4, and by the admiral's will received an ample income, afterward increased by royal grants. He amassed a library of over 20,000 volumes, which passed by will to the cathedral chapter of Seville where it was known as the "Columbina." Of about 4,000 volumes remain. A history of the Indies by him is lost, as is the original Spanish of his biography of his father, which was used by Las Casas.

Columbus, Sp. Colon (kō-lōn'), Luis. Born at Santo Domingo, 1521 or 1522; died in Oran, Africa, Feb. 3, 1572. A son of Diego and grandson of Christopher Columbus. In 1556 he gave up all claims to the title of viceroy, receiving in return the Islands of Jamaica and Juanaguana, Andalusia, Veragua, and the title of Duke of Veragua and Marquis of Jamaica. He was captain-general of Hispaniola 1542–51. He was imprisoned in 1563 for 18 months, was tried, and 1565 banished to Oran. For descent of the titles, see Veragua, Dukes of.

Columella (kol-ū-mel'lā). Lucius Junius Moderatus. Born at Cadiz, Spain; lived about 40 A. D. A Roman writer on agriculture. He wrote "De re rustica," in twelve books edited by Schneider in the "Scriptores rei rusticæ," 1794), and an earlier work on the same subject, of which one book, "De Arboribus," is extant.

Column of July, F. Colonne de Juillet (kō-lon' dē zhüē-yā'). A monument in Paris, France, erected on the site of the Bastille in 1840, in honor of the citizens killed in the attacks on the royal government in 1830. It is a Corinthian column of bronze, 13 feet in diameter, rising from a square base and surmounted by an urn cast and gilded by a gilded statue of the winged Genius of Liberty. Its total height is 154 feet.

Column of Marcus Aurelius, or Antonine Column. A monument in the Piazza Colonna, Rome, erected in 174 A. D. in honor of the campaigns against the Marcomanni. It reproduces the type of the Column of Trajan, and consists of a Roman Doric column of marble raised on a square pedestal, the total height, without the statue of St. Paul of Sixtus V., being 123 feet. The shaft is sculptured in a spiral of 26 turns, with reliefs of the wars it commemorates.

Column of the Congress, F. Colonne du Congrès (kō-lon' dü kōn-grā'). A monument erected in Brussels, Belgium, in commemoration of the Belgian constitutional congress of 1831. It is a Roman Doric column 147 feet high, on the summit of which stands a statue of Leopold I. Reliefs on the pedestal represent the Belgian provinces. At the angles stand four female figures in bronze, personifying types of liberty.

Column of Trajan. A monument in Rome, dedicated in 114 A. D. in honor of the emperor. It is a Roman Doric column of marble, on a square basement, the total height, exclusive of the present statue of St. Peter, being 127 feet. The base bears reliefs of warlike trophies and an inscription; the entire shaft is occupied by vigorous and lifelike reliefs ascending in a spiral, representing Trajan's campaigns. The reliefs contain about 2,500 human figures, besides those of animals and inanimate objects.

Column of Vendôme (von-dōm'), F. Colonne Vendôme. A monument in the Place Vendôme, Paris, France. It is a Roman Doric column of masonry incased in bronze, in design imitating the Column of Trajan at Rome, and was erected by Napoleon in honor of his victories over the Russians and Austrians in 1805. The shaft is encircled with reliefs referring to the campaigns in question, ascending in a spiral, the height of the figures being 3 feet. The column is surmounted by a figure of the emperor. Its height is 142 feet, and its diameter 13 feet. It was overthrown by the Commune in 1871, but was restored in 1875.

Columns of Hercules. See Pillars of Hercules.

Columns of St. Mark and St. Theodore. Two columns in Venice, situated at the end of the Piazzetta toward the Grand Canal. The massive plain cylindrical shafts are of granite, the western pink, the eastern gray, resting on spreading stepped bases. The capitals are ascribed to a Lombard architect. The figure of St. Theodore, with his crocodile, was erected on the western column in 1329. The eastern column bears the famous winged lion of St. Mark, in bronze, with eyes inlaid in precious stones. The existing lion is of the 15th century.

Colville (kol'vil). A name, of European origin, applied to a Salishan tribe formerly dwelling near Kettle Falls on the upper Columbia River, near the Canadian boundary. The tribe now numbers 247 persons, dwelling on the Fuyallup reservation, Washington. See Salishan.

Coma Berenices (kō'mā ber-e-ni'sēz). [L., 'hair of Berenice.' See Berenice.] An ancient asterism (though not one of the 48 constellations of Hipparchus) situated north of Virgo and between Boötes and Leo, and supposed to represent the famous amber hair of Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy Energetes.

Comacchio (kō-mak'kē-ō). A town in the province of Ferrara, Italy, situated near the Adriatic 29 miles southeast of Ferrara. Population, 7,000.

Comana (kō-mā'nā). [Gr. tà Kómava.] 1. In ancient geography, a city of Cappadocia, Asia Minor, situated on the river Sarus. It was noted for its temple to Ma, the moon-goddess. Also called Chryse (the Golden).—2. In ancient geography, a city of Pontus, Asia Minor, situated about lat. 40° 20′ N., long. 36° 50′ E. It was perhaps a colony of the Cappadocian city, and it was sacred to the same goddess. The modern Gumenek is on the site.

Comanche (kō-man'chē), or Camanche (kaman'chē). [Pl., also Comanches.] A tribe of North American Indians, well known for their martial character. According to tradition and linguistic evidence they were formerly neighbors of the Shoshonean tribes. In 1724 they were upper Kiowas river, and later were south of Red River, Texas, this southward extension doubtless being due to pressure by Western tribes. By 1750 they were on the Texan plains from the Rocky Mountains eastward into Indian Territory and Texas as far as long. 97°, although they raided the country from Kansas southward as far as Durango, Mexico (a distance of 800 miles). They agreed to go upon a reservation in 1868, at which date they numbered about 2,500. The Comanche now on the Kiowa, Comanche, and Wichita reservation, Oklahoma, number 753. Their own name is Nem. 'people.' Comanche, a name of unknown signification, was first applied by the Spanish Mexicans, while the French form, Padouca, is adapted from their Sioux name. They also have been known as Chouanna, Comatde, Kaimanias, Neum, Padouca, and Paducah. See Shoshonean.

Comecrudo (kō-mā-krō'dō). A tribe of North American Indians which live on the lower Rio Grande at Las Prietas, Tamaulipas, Mexico. Of the 25 survivors in 1886 but seven spoke their native tongue. The name is said to signify 'raw eaters' (Sp. come-crudo), in allusion to their practice of cannibalism. Also called Carrizos. See Coahuiltecan.

Comédie Française (kō-mā-dē' fron-sāz'), La. The official name of the Théâtre Français. The Comédie Française practically had its beginning in the Théâtre de l'Hôtel Bourgogne, established in 1532 and made theatre royal under Louis XIV. It was followed by the Théâtre du Marais in 1600. A few years afterward the company of Molière was established in the great hall of the Hôtel Bourbon. In 1660 the Hôtel Bourbon was torn down, and in 1661 Molière was transferred to the theater of the Palais Royal. In 1673 Molière died; his company was disbanded and went to the Théâtre Guénégaud. In 1680 there were three companies in Paris—that of the Hôtel Bourgogne, that of the Marais, and the company of Molière in the Théâtre Guénégaud: the two latter were amalgamated Oct. 21, 1680, and the Comédie Française organized by lettre de cachet of Louis XIV. as "L'Hotel des comédiens du Roi entretenus par Sa Majesté." The Comédie Française acted frequently. In 1689 it had its home in the Rue des Fosses St. Germain des Prés (Rue de l'Ancienne Comédie): it was here and in this year that it first took the title of Comédie Française. In 1770 it removed to the Tuileries, and in 1782 the company played in what is now the Odeon. It was suppressed in the Revolution in 1793, and reconstituted by Napoleon, then first consul, and established in the Théâtre Français. See Théâtre Français.

Comédie Humaine (ko-mā-dē' ü-mān'), La. A collection of Balzac's novels, arranged and connected with laborious classification by himself to show that he called a "complete society," the same persons and their relatives appearing and reappearing. "Each novel is in fact a page of the great work, which would be incomplete without it." It is a picture of the manners and morals of his own time.

Comedy of Errors, The. A play by Shakspere, acted at Gray's Inn, Dec. 28, 1594. Its real title is "Errors." It is thought that another version not entirely by Shakspere was acted about 1576. The original plot was probably suggested by Plautus's "Menæchmi" and "Amphitryon," and more directly by the "History of Error" acted by the chapel children in 1576. (Bleon.) The plot consists in the extraordinary series of mistakes arising from the likeness between twin brothers, both named Antipholus, and the likeness between their two servants, named Dromio.

Comely Bank (kum'li bangk). See the extract.

The Carlyles, at the period of Thomas's famous visit to Jeffrey in George Street, were living at Comely Bank, in one of a row of two-storied, uninteresting houses, calling themselves "villa residences," on the north side of Edinburgh, quite out of town even now, and facing a green called Stockbridge Public Park. Carlyle's cottage is numbered 21.

Comines, or Commines, or Comynes, Philippe de. Born at Comines, near Lille, France (or at Renescure, near Hazebrouck), about 1445; died at Argenton, Deux-Sèvres, France, Oct. 17, 1519. A noted French statesman and historian. He entered the service of Charles the Bold, and then went over to Louis XI., in whose household he rose to the dignity of confidant and counselor. In 1486 he was arrested for political reasons and imprisoned for over two years. At the command of Charles VIII. he was arrested again later on, and exiled for ten years. After serving his time, he returned to court only to fall into disgrace. Finally he retired into private life and wrote his "Mémoires." The "Cronique et hystoire faicte et composée par messire Philippe de Comines" (Paris, 1524) was written from 1488 to 1496. It deals with the history of France between 1464.

when Comines came to the court of Charles the Bold, and 1485, the date of the death of Louis XI. The sequel, "Croniques du roy Charles huytiesme" (Paris, 1528), was written later than 1497, and contains notes on the wars waged by Charles VIII. between 1494 and 1498. Complete editions have been made by Denis Sauvage (1552), Godefroy (1649), Lenglet-Dufresnoy (1747), Mademoiselle Dupont (1840-47), and R. Chantelauze (1881).

Compiègne (kōn-pyany'). A town in the department of Oise, France, situated on the Oise 45 miles northeast of Paris: the ancient Compendium. It was noted as a favorite royal residence, and its chief buildings are royal palaces, a large cathedral founded in Merovingian times and rebuilt in the reign of Louis XV. and later. The interior is especially noteworthy for its furniture and decoration of the apartments fitted out under Napoleon I., and contains a collection of modern paintings. At Compiègne in 1430 Joan of Arc was taken prisoner, and it has been the seat of several councils. Population (1891), commune, 14,495.

Complaint to his Purse. A poem by Occleve, attributed to Chaucer. It was printed before the 1532 edition.

Complaint of Mars. A poem by Chaucer, written probably after 1380. It is full of astronomical allusions, and contains the story of "the broche" which Vulcan wrought at Thebes. It is supposed to be sung on St. Valentine's day by a bird. A "Complaint of Venus" has been appended to it. The latter is of a totally different character, and is a translation from the French of Sir Otes de Grausson (Shirley). It is probable that the Venus in both poems refers to the princess Isabel of Spain.

Complaint to Pity. A poem by Chaucer, printed before 1532, and probably written about 1367. Skeat.

Complaint of Philomene, The. A poem by George Gascoigne, begun in 1562, but not completed until 1576.

Complaint of Venus, The. A poem by Chaucer, translated by him late in life from the French of Granson. It is made up of three independent ballades: the title was given by the translator as a name apt to the "Complaint of Mars," to which it is appended.

Compton (komp'ton), Henry. Born at Compton Wynyates, Warwickshire, 1632; died at Fulham, near London, July 7, 1713. An English prelate, bishop of London, and youngest son of Spencer Compton, second earl of Northampton. He studied at Oxford (Queen's College) and at Cambridge, was installed canon of Christ Church in 1667, became bishop of Oxford in 1674, and bishop of London in 1675, and was charged with the education of Mary and Anne (later queens) daughters of James, duke of York (James II.). After the accession of James he was tried before Lord Chancellor Jeffreys, as head of the high court of ecclesiastical commission for disobeying the king (for refusing to suspend John Sharp, dean of Norwich, and suspended for preaching Articles of his episcopal functions; but was reinstated in less). He was a vigorous opponent of Catholicism and an influential supporter of William III.

Compton, Spencer. Born May, 1601: killed in the battle of Hopton Heath, March 19, 1643. The second Earl of Northampton, a partizan of Charles I. in his struggle with Parliament. He was elected with the king's army, commanding the royalist forces at Hopton Heath which he was slain.

Compton, Spencer. Born about 1673; died July 2, 1743. An English politician, third son of the third Earl of Northampton, created Viscount Pevensey and earl of Wilmington in 1730. He was chosen speaker of the House of Commons March 17, 1715, and re-elected Oct. 9, 1722. In Feb., 1742, he was appointed first lord of the treasury.

Comtat d'Avignon (kōn-tä' dä-ven-yōn'), and Comtat-Venaissin (ven-es-sań'). Two ancient territories of southern France, lying between Dauphiné on the north, Provence on the east, the Durance on the south, and the Rhône on the west. They were ceded to the popes in the 13th century, and were united to France in 1791. They correspond nearly to the department of Vaucluse.

Comte (kōnt), Isidore Auguste Marie François Xavier. Born at Montpellier, France, Jan. 19, 1798; died at Paris, Sept. 5, 1857. A celebrated French philosopher, founder of positivism. He studied two years at the École Polytechnique in Paris (having been admitted in 1814), and afterward became the friend and disciple of Saint-Simon, whose doctrines he undertook to expound in a work entitled "Système de politique positive" in 1822. His friendship terminated in a complete estrangement in 1824. He was tutor at the École Polytechnique in 2 A. D. His chief works are "Cours de philosophie positive" (1830–42), and "Catéchisme positiviste" (1852).

Comte de Boursoufle (kōnt de bör-sō'fl), Le. A comedy by Voltaire, first produced as "Quand est-ce qu'on mentira?" It was privately played for the first time under that title at the Chateau de Cirey in 1738, and again in 1745 at the Château d'Anet. It was produced at the Odéon as "Le Comte de Boursoufle" in 1802 as a posthumous play of Voltaire. It was really made from the broader parts of Vanbrugh's "Relapse." The Comte de Boursoufle is a caricature of Regnard.

Comte de Monte-Cristo (kōnt dē mōn'te-krēs'tō), Le. A novel by Alexandre Dumas, published in 1844; so named from its hero.

Comte Ory (kōnt o-rē'). Le. An opera by Rossini (words by Scribe and Delestre-Poirson), produced in French at Paris Aug. 20, 1828, and in Italian at London Feb. 28, 1829, and in French June 29, 1849. Both words and music were adaptations of works by the same authors written some years before.

Comtesse d'Escarbagnas (kōn-tes' des-kär-bän-yä'). La. A comedy by Molière, first played for the king at Saint-Germain in 1671. The next year it was played in Paris on Feb. 2. It is a study of provincial manners.

Comtesse de Rudolstadt (kōn-tes' dē rō-dol-stät'). La. A novel by George Sand, a sequel to "Consuelo," published in 1844.

Comus (kō'mus). [Gr. Κῶμος.] In later classical mythology, the god of mirth, represented as a winged youth.

Comus. A mask by Milton, presented at Ludlow Castle Sept. 29, 1634, before the Earl of Bridgewater. It was printed in 1637, and in his works in 1645. Milton is said to be indebted to Fletcher's "Faithful Shepherdess" for the lyrical portions, and for its central situation to Peele's "Old Wives' Tale." George Colman the elder produced an alteration of it at Covent Garden in 1773.

Comyn (kum'in), Alexander. Died in 1289. The second Earl of Buchan, constable of Scotland.

Conachar (kon'a-chär). The son of the chief of Clan Quhele in Sir Walter Scott's "Fair Maid of Perth." After becoming the chief himself he realized that he was a coward, and killed himself in despair.

Conaire (ko-när'). See the extract.

> A description of Cormac's person, on the occasion of his entering a great assembly in state, tells us that the equal of his form had never been seen, except that of Conaire the Great, of Conchobar son of Nessa, or of Aengus son of the Bagda. It is remarkable that the ancient writer should mention these three, as they are adumbrations of the same god as Cormac. Thus I may here say, without anticipating the remarks to be presently made on the Aengus to whom I have alluded, that he was the constant rider and protector of the sun-born Diarmait, while Cuchulainn was the subject of one of the most famous epic stories in Irish literature. The plot centres in Conaire's tragic death, which is brought about by the fairies of Emhn, through the instrumentality of outlaws coming from the sea and following the lead of a sort of ecclops called Ingcel, said to have had one long, round, horrid eyebrow with only one eye, which was, however, wider than an ox-hide, thicker than the back of a beetle, and provided with no less than three pupils. The death of Conaire, in his hands is one of the Celtic renderings of the story which in its Greek form describes the treatment of Zeus by Typho. Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 135.

Conant (kō'nant), Mrs. (Hannah Chaplin). Born at Danvers, Mass., in 1809: died at Brooklyn, N. Y., Feb. 18, 1865. An American writer, wife of T. J. Conant. Her best work is a "History of the English Bible" (1856).

Conant, Thomas Jefferson. Born at Brandon, Vt., Dec. 13, 1802: died at Brooklyn, N. Y., April 30, 1891. An American Baptist clergyman and biblical critic. He translated Gesenius's Hebrew grammar (1839), and published annotated versions of "Job" (1857), "Matthew" (1860), "Genesis" (1868, 1878), "New Testament, Common Version revised" (1871), "Historical Books of the Old Testament" (1884), etc.

Concepcion del Uruguay (del ö-rö-gwī'). A town in the province of Entre Rios, Argentine Republic, situated on the Uruguay north of Buenos Ayres. Population, 10,000.

Conceptistas (kōn-thep-tēs'tās). See the extract.

> At that time, and very much under the leading influence of Ledesma, there was a well-known party in Spanish literature called the "Conceptistas"; — a sect composed, in a considerable degree, of mystics, who expressed themselves in metaphors and puns alike in the pulpit and in poetry, and whose influence was so extensive that traces of it may be found in many of the principal writers of the time, including Quevedo and Lope de Vega. Of this school of the Conceptistas, though Quevedo was the more brilliant master, Ledesma was the original head.

Concha (kon'chä), José Gutierrez de la. Born at Cordova (now in Argentina), June 4, 1809. A Spanish general and statesman. He went to Spain when a child, entered the army, and attained the grade of mariscal. He was captain-general of the Philippines 1843–46, three times captain-general of Cuba (1849–52, 1853–59, and 1874–75), senator 1860, minister to France 1862, minister of war 1865, and president of the senate 1864–68. In Sept., 1868, Queen Isabella, then in France, appointed him president of the council, with full powers, but he was forced to resign by the revolution of Sept. 28, which ended in the overthrow of the monarchy.

Concha, Manuel de la, Marques de Duero. Born at Cordova del Tucuman, Buenos Ayres, April 25, 1808: killed at the battle of Muro, Spain, June 28, 1874. A Spanish general, brother of José de la Concha, prime minister 1868.

Conchobar (kon-chō'bär). See the extract.

> In another cycle of stories, which may be called Ultonian, the Celtic Zeus finds his representative in Conchobar mac Nessa, or Conner son of Nessa, king of Ulster. . . . As in Cormac's case, a highly coloured picture is drawn of his reign, which the Euhemerists synchronize with the time of Christ, boldly fixing the Ultonian king's death on the day of the crucifixion.

Conchos (kon'chōs). [So called from the Rio Conchos.] A roving Indian tribe of southern Chihuahua and in part of Coahuila, Mexico, of a low degree of culture. As a tribe it has disappeared, as has also its language, almost entirely. The Conchos were converted, in the beginning of the 17th century, by Fray Alonzo de la Oliva. They were first met with about 1564 by Francisco de Ibarra. They were always of a mild and friendly disposition.

Conchos (kon'chōs). [Sp., 'Shell river'; from concha, shell.] A river which rises in southern Chihuahua and empties into the Rio Grande from the west, opposite Presidio del Norte in Texas. The name was given to the river on account of the many shells found on its shores. The tribe of Conchos afterward derived its name from the stream.

Conciergerie (kōn-syerzh-rē'), La. The old prison of the Palais de Justice in Paris. When the palace, which was originally fortified, was inhabited by the kings of France, the part of the building containing the house of the concierge of the palace received this name. Distinguished personages occupied this office, which, in 1348, was called the "concierge-ballí." It existed till the Revolution, and was a post of responsibility. Among other things, the concierge had charge of all royal prisoners. The Conciergerie became widely known during the Reign of Terror. From April 6 to July 28 two hundred eight prisoners were butchered there in one week. The cell occupied by Marie Antoinette was destroyed by the communists in 1871, but the prison still exists.

Concord (kong'kord). 1. The capital of New Hampshire, situated on the Merrimac in lat. 43° 13' N., long. 71° 30' W. It has manufactures of wagons, harnesses, cotton and woolen goods, granite, leather, etc. From 1733 to 1765 it was called Rumford. It became a city in 1853. Population (1890), 17,004.

2. A town in Middlesex County, Massachusetts, situated on the Concord River 17 miles northwest of Boston. It was the residence of Emerson, Hawthorne, Thoreau, and other men of letters. The bridge over Concord River was the scene, April 19, 1775, of an engagement between British and Provincial troops in the War of Independence. (See Concord, Battle of, and Lexington, Battle of.) It was the center of the "Transcendental" movement about 1835–40, and later the seat of the "Concord School of Philosophy." Population (1890), 4,422.

Concord (Mass.), Battle of. One of the opening skirmishes of the American War of Independence. A body of 800 British soldiers under Lieutenant-Colonel Smith and Major Pitcairn, detailed to destroy military stores at Concord, April 19, 1775, after a slight engagement at Lexington (which see), an armed force of 300 Provincial troops under Colonel Barrett and Major Buttrick. After a brisk fusillade, in which several on both sides were killed and wounded, the British retreated toward Boston by way of Lexington, being harassed by the Provincials on the road. The retreat became a rout.

Concordat of 1801, The. An agreement concluded July 15, 1801, between Napoleon Bonaparte (then first consul) and Pius VII. It reestablished the Roman Catholic religion in France, and granted to the government the right of appointing archbishops and bishops, who were to be confirmed by the Pope. It went into operation on April 8, 1802.

Concordat of 1855, The. An agreement concluded at Vienna, Aug. 18, 1855, between Francis Joseph of Austria and Pius IX. It gave the clergy control of the press and of public instruction, and placed cases of the canon law, especially marriage affairs, under the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical courts. It was abrogated in July, 1870.

Concordat of Francis I., The. A convention concluded in 1516 between Francis I. of France and Leo X. It replaced the pragmatic sanction of Bourges, a modification of the reformatory decrees of the Council of Basel, which had been adopted at the Diet of Bourges in 1438, but which had never been recognized by the Pope. It reestablished the annats, referred the election magister to Rome, and gave to the king the right of nominating bishops.

Concordat of Worms, The. A convention concluded in 1122 between the emperor Henry V. and Calixtus II. It provided that the election of bishop and abbots in Germany should take place in the presence of the emperor or his representatives; that investiture by the emperor should precede consecration; that investiture should be conferred, not with the ring and staff, but with the scepter; that in Italy and Burgundy investiture should follow canonical election and consecration; and that ecclesiastics holding secular benefices should perform feudal services. This instrument put an end to the War of the Investiture between the emperor and the Pope, and became a fundamental ordinance of the Holy Roman Empire.

Concordia (kon-kôr'di-ä). In Roman mythology, the goddess of concord. There were several temples to her in Rome.

Condé, Prince de (Henri I. de Bourbon). Born at Ferté-sous-Jouarre, Dec. 7, 1552: poisoned at St.-Jean-d'Angély, France, March 5, 1588. A French Protestant leader, son of the first Prince de Condé.

Condé, Prince de (Henri II. de Bourbon). Born at St.-Jean-d'Angé, France, Sept. 1, 1588: died at Paris, Dec., 1646. Son of Henri I., and father of "The Great Condé." He headed a revolt against the regency during the minority of Louis XIII., in consequence of which he was imprisoned three years at Vincennes. He subsequently became a partizan of Richelieu.

Condé, Prince de (Henri Jules de Bourbon). Born at Paris, July 29, 16—: died at Paris, April 1, 1709. Only son of "The Great Condé." He served with distinction at the siege of Tournay in 1665, and in 1674 participated in the battle of Senef, on which occasion he is said to have saved his father's life.

Condé, José Antonio. Born at Paraleja, Cuenca, Spain, about 1765: died at Madrid, Oct. 20, 1820. A Spanish Orientalist and historian. He studied at the University of Alcalá, and obtained a subordinate position in the Royal Library. Having in 1808 identified himself with the French party, he was soon after promoted to librarian in chief by Joseph Bonaparte. He was exiled on the departure of the French, but returned in 1818 or 1819. His chief work is "Historia de la dominacion de los Arabes en España" (1820–21).

Condé, first Prince de (Louis I. de Bourbon), Born at Vendôme, France, May 7, 1530: died March 13, 1569. A French general, younger brother of Antoine de Bourbon, king of Navarre. He was one of the leaders in the conspiracy of Amboise, the object of which was to compel Francis II. by force of arms to recognize the Reformed religion. At the accession of Charles IX. he was appointed governor of Picardy by Catherine de' Medici. On the massacre of the Huguenots at Vassy by the Duke of Guise in 1562, he placed himself at the head of the Huguenot army, with the result that he was, after some preliminary successes, captured at the battle of Dreux, being, however, liberated in 1563 at the treaty of Amboise. He was captured at the battle of Jarnac, when, after having surrendered his sword, he was treacherously shot by a Catholic officer.

Condé, Prince de (Louis II. de Bourbon), called "The Great Condé." Born at Paris, Sept. 8, 1621: died at Fontainebleau, France, Dec. 11, 1686. A celebrated French general, called during the lifetime of his father (Henri II.) the Duc d'Enghien. He defeated the Spaniards at Rocroi May 19, 1643, the Imperialists at Nordlingen Aug. 3, 1645, and the Spaniards at Lens Aug. 20, 1648. In the war of the Fronde he was at first loyal to the regency, but subsequently joined the Frondé. He defeated the army of the courtat Bleneau April 6, 1652, obtaining subsequently the chief command of the Spanish army in the war against France, was condemned as a traitor by the Parliament of Paris, but was pardoned by the young king Louis XIV. by the treaty of the Pyrenees in 1659. He conquered Franche-Comté in 1668, fought a drawn battle with the Prince of Orange at Senef in 1674, succeeded Turenne as commander of the army of the Rhine in 1675.

Condé, Prince de (Louis Joseph de Bourbon). Born at Paris, Aug. 9, 1736: died at Paris, May 13, 1818. A French general, son of Louis Henri, duke of Bourbon. He entered the army at the beginning of the Seven Years' War, became lieutenant-general in 1758, and defeated the Allies at Friedberg in 1762. During the popular agitation which preceded the French Revolution he strenuously opposed all measures designed to limit the privileges of the nobility and the clergy. He emigrated in 1789, and organized a corps of emigrants, with which he joined the Austrian army in 1792. After the peace of Campo-Formio in 1797 he served with his corps in the Russian army until the withdrawal of Paul I. from the coalition against France in 1800, when he reentered the Austrian service. Compelled by the peace of Lunéville to disband his corps, he retired to England, whence he returned to France on the restoration in 1814. Author of "Essai sur la vie du grand Condé" (1806).

Condé, Princesse de (Louise Adélaïde de Bourbon). Born at Chantilly, France, Oct. 5, 1757: died at Paris, March 10, 1824. Daughter of Louis Joseph de Bourbon (1736–1818).

She became abbess of Remiremont in 1786, emigrated at the beginning of the French Revolution, and in 1815 returned to Paris, where she subsequently founded the religious order of Adoration perpetuelle.

Confederação do Equador (kōn-fe-de-rä-sän' dō-ä-kwä-dōr'). [Pg., 'League of the Equator.'] The name given to a political league formed at Pernambuco, Brazil, in 1824, with the object of throwing off allegiance to the emperor, and establishing a republic. The revolt was proclaimed by Manuel de Carvalho Paes de Andrade and his associates on July 3, 1824. Rio Grande do Norte, Ceará, and Parahyba adhered to it, and Carvalho was made acting president. The revolutionists were conquered after some fighting in Oct., 1824.

Confederacion Centro-Americana (kōn-fā-thä-rä-thē-ōn' then'trō-ä-mä-rā-kä'nä). [Sp., 'Central-American Confederation.'] A political league formed at Chinandega, Nicaragua, July 27, 1842, by the delegates of Nicaragua, Honduras, and Salvador. It was the result of an attempt to reunite the states of the Central American Republic, which had lately been dissolved. The scheme was to form a confederation of the states, with an executive officer called a supreme delegate, assisted by a delegate from each state. The plan was rejected by Guatemala; and though the confederacy installed a government, it was so little regarded by the states that it never had any political effect. After a year or two it was discontinued. This abortive attempt is often called the "Pacto de Chinandega."

Confederacy, The. A comedy by Sir John Vanbrugh, produced Oct., 30, 1705. It is a play of contrivance and intrigue, and is said to be adapted from Dancourt's "Modish Citizens" ("Bourgeois à la mode").

Confederate States of America. A confederacy of eleven States which seceded from the United States in 1860 and 1861 and formed a government. The legislative power was vested in a senate of 26 members, 2 from each State (Kentucky and Missouri being represented), and a representative house of 106 members. Among the leading events in its history were the passage of ordinances of secession by South Carolina, Dec. 20, 1860; Mississippi, Jan. 9, 1861; Florida, Jan. 10; Alabama, Jan. 11; Georgia, Jan. 19; Louisiana, Jan. 26; Texas, Feb. 1; meeting of provisional congress, Montgomery, Ala., Feb. 4; adoption of provisional constitution, Feb. 8; inauguration of provisional President Jefferson Davis and Vice-President Alexander H. Stephens, Feb. 18; adoption of a permanent constitution, March 11; evacuation of Fort Sumter by Federals, April 14; passage of secession ordinances by Virginia, April 17; Arkansas, May 6; Tennessee, May 7; North Carolina, May 20; removal of the capital to Richmond, July 20; election of Davis and Stephens as president and vice-president for six years, Nov. 6, 1861, and their inauguration Feb. 22, 1862; final adjournment of congress, March 18, 1865; occupation of Richmond by the Federals, April 3; surrender of Lee's army, April 9, 1865. The eleven seceding States were admitted to the Union from 1866 to 1870. Compare Civil War.

Confederates, The. A farce by John Durant Breval under the name "Joseph Gay." It was suggested by John Gay's "Three Hours after Marriage."

Confessio Amantis (kon-fesh'iō a-man'tis). [L., 'Confession of a Lover.'] A poem by Gower, written about 1393 (Morley thinks in its first form before 1386). It is a series of stories connected somewhat after the fashion of the Decameron. Genius, the "clerk" of Venus, hears the confession of the lover, and undertakes to instruct him in truth in fair love. It was published by Caxton in both a long and a short form.

Confession d'un Enfant du Siècle, La. [F., 'The Confession of a Child of the Century.'] A prose work by Alfred de Musset, published in 1836. In it he says he endeavors to show how unfitted for modern life was the generation of the age—doubt, disillusion, skepticism, and debauchery—and to point out to others a way of escape.

Confessions of an English Opium-Eater. A partly autobiographical work by De Quincey, published in 1822.

Confessions of Saint Augustine, The. The memoirs of Saint Augustine, written by himself. They are divided into 13 books: the first to treat of the bad actions of his life, of his conversion, of the love of pleasure, of glory, and of sensuality. The last three are a paraphrase of the beginning of the book of Genesis.

Confessions, Les. An autobiographical work by Jean Jacques Rousseau. It is in 12 volumes. 6 of which were written at Wootton, England, 1766-67, and 6 at Bourgoin and Trye, France, 1768-70. It was his intention that they should not be published till 1800, as the persons alluded to in them were living; but those in charge of the MS. published the first 6 volumes in 1781-82. In 1788 a new edition appeared, containing the whole.

Confines, Audience of the. [Sp. Audiencia de los Confines.] The supreme Spanish court of Central America. It was established in 1542 and held its first session at Gracias a Dios in 1543. It was changed to Guatemala in 1549, transferred to Panama in 1565, and returned in 1570 to Guatemala, where it remained until the revolution. Its jurisdiction at first embraced Chiapas, Yucatan, all of Central America, and the islands; at the end of the 16th century the judicial portion was transferred to the new audience of Panama. The Audiencia of the Confines frequently appointed temporary governors. It is often spoken of as the "Audience of Guatemala."

Confians-l'Archevêque (kōn-flon'lärsh-vāk'). A village situated 3 miles southeast of Paris. Here, in 1465, Louis XI. signed a treaty making certain concessions to the leaders of the "League of the Public Good."

Confians (kōn-flon'). Treaty of. A treaty concluded Oct. 9, 1465, between Louis XI. of France and the dukes of Bourbon, Brittany, and Burgundy, according to which Normandy was ceded to the Duke of Berry, and the "War of the Public Good" ended. It was confirmed by the treaty of Péronne, 1468.

Confucius (kon-fū'shius). [Latinized form of China. K'ung-fu-tzŭ (last syllable is also written -tse, -tze, etc.), 'Kung the philosopher.'] Born in the principality of Lu (the modern province of Shantung), China, 550 or 551 B. C.: died 478 B. C. A celebrated Chinese philosopher. He was descended from a nobleman, but impoverished family, and in his youth was studiously kept out of stores and superintendent of parks and herds to the chief of the district in which he lived. In his twenty-second year he became a teacher, and in his fifty-second was made chief magistrate of the city of Chung-tu. He was subsequently appointed minister of crime by the Marquis of Lu, but in his fifty-sixth year retired from office in consequence of the intrigues of a neighboring prince. After thirteen years of travel he returned in 483 B. C. to what he spent the rest of his life in completing his literary researches and in teaching. Among the numerous works attributed to him, the most notable are the "Chun-Tsew" (which see), and the "Four Books" (which see).

Congreve (kong'grev), Richard. Born at Leamington, England, Sept. 4, 1818. An English essayist and philosophical writer.

Congreve, William. Born at Bardsey, near Leeds, England, 1670 (baptized Feb. 10): died at London, Jan. 19, 1729. An English dramatist, one of the greatest masters of comedy. Soon after his birth his parents removed to Ireland, where his father became commander of the garrison at Youghal and also agent of the Earl of Cork. He was educated at a school in Kilkenny (where he was one of his schoolfellows) and at Trinity College, Dublin. After a brief period devoted to the study of law, he applied himself chiefly to literature until about 1696, but after this year wrote little or nothing. He filled several unimportant offices that did not necessitate his residence in London, from July, 1695, to Oct., 1705, that of commissioner of wine licenses from Dec., 1705, to Dec., 1714, and that of secretary for Jamaica from 1714. His plays include "The Old Bachelor" (acted Jan., 1693), "The Double Dealer" (Nov., 1693), "Love for Love" (April, 1695), "The Mourning Bride" (1697), and "The Way of the World" (1700). Besides his plays he wrote a novel (his first literary work) entitled "Incognita" and a poem on Queen Mary. In a reply to Jeremy Collier's attack upon him in his work on the immorality of the stage, called "Amendments of Mr. Collier's False and Imperfect Citations," and a few prologues and unimportant poems. In 1710 a collected edition of his works was published by him in 3 vols. He is celebrated especially for the brilliancy of his style and the wit and vigor of his dialogues. His work is marred by the almost total absence of fine moral feeling, as well as by the coarseness common in his day.

Congreve, Sir William. Born at Woolwich, England, May 20, 1772: died at Toulouse, France, May 15, 1828. An English engineer, best known as the inventor of the Congreve rocket. He was appointed, April, 1814, comptroller of the royal laboratory at Woolwich, in which office he succeeded his father, Lieutenant-General Sir William Congreve. He published a number of works on economical and technological topics.

Conkling (kongk'ling), Roscoe. Born at Albany, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1829: died at New York, April 18, 1888. An American politician. He was member of Congress (Republican) from New York 1859–63 and 1865–67, and was United States senator from New York 1867–81, when he resigned in consequence of a dispute with President Garfield concerning the Federal patronage in the State of New York, which he and his colleague, Thomas C. Platt, claimed the right to control. The President having appointed William H. Robertson, an opponent of Conkling, to the collectorship of the port of New York, the latter opposed the confirmation of the appointment by the Senate, on the ground that he and his colleague had not been consulted by the President as to the disposition of the collectorship. On the confirmation of the appointment, both he and his colleague resigned their seats with a view to administering a rebuke to the President by securing a prompt reelection, but were defeated by Warner Miller and Elbridge G. Lapham.

Connecticut (ko-net'i-kut). A State in New England, and one of the 13 original States of the American Union, lying between Massachusetts on the north, Rhode Island on the east, Long Island Sound on the south, and New York on the west. It is divided into 8 counties, and has 4 representatives 2 senators, and 6 electoral votes. Its surface is hilly. Its chief rivers are the Thames, Connecticut, and Housatonic, the valley of the last-named being its most fertile region. The chief agricultural products are cereals and tobacco, and its leading manufactures are hardware, firearms, silks, cotton and woolen goods, and clocks. The capital is Hartford. It was settled by the Dutch at Hartford in 1633, and by Massachusetts colonists in the Connecticut valley in 1635–36. Separate English colonies were formed at Saybrook in 1635–36 and at New Haven in 1638. Charles II. granted a charter to the Connecticut colony in 1662, and the present constitution was adopted in 1818. The territory of Connecticut was the scene of the Pequot war in 1637. The State is often nicknamed the "Nutmeg State," from an alleged custom of its merchants of manufacturing nutmegs out of wood; also called the "Land of Steady Habits," from the stringency of the so-called "Blue Laws," which enjoined a rigid code of morals on its inhabitants. Area, 4,990 square miles. Population (1890), 746,258.

King of Germany 911–18. On the extinction of the Carolingian house in Germany with the death of Ludwig the Child in 911, the election fell upon Conrad, duke of Franconia. During his reign the country was invaded by the Danes, Slavs, and Hungarians, and he was constantly at war with the West Franks and with his own subjects in a vain endeavor to enforce the recognition of his sovereignty, especially from Henry, duke of Saxony, son of Otto the Illustrious.

Conrad II. Died at Utrecht, June 4, 1039. King of Germany 1024–39, and Roman emperor, called "The Salian": founder of the Franconian or Salian dynasty. He marched into Italy 1026, brought the rebellious cities of Pavia and Ravenna to submission, and was crowned emperor at Rome 1027. He put down the rebellion of his stepson Ernst, duke of Swabia, 1025–30, made an inroad into Hungary 1030, regained Lusatia from the Poles 1031, and made himself master of Burgundy (the kingdom of Arles) 1033–34. He marched into Italy a second time 1036, but was compelled by the successful opposition of Milan to acknowledge by the constitution of May 28, 1037, the hereditary character of all Italian fiefs whether, held immediately of the crown or not, which also became the custom in Germany.

Conrad III. Born 1093: died at Bamberg, Germany, Feb. 15, 1152. King of Germany 1138–52, founder of the Hohenstaufen dynasty. He was elected in an irregular manner by the party opposed to the house of Savoy, which gave rise to a war with the rival candidate Henry the Proud, duke of Saxony and Bavaria. The war was continued after Henry's death (1139) by his brother Welf VI., whence arose the party names of the Ghibellines (Italian corruption of the name of the Hohenstaufen castle Waiblingen) and the Welfs or Guelphs. Conrad defeated Welf at Weinsberg in 1140, and took part (1147–48) in the second Crusade.

Conrad IV. Born at Andria, Italy, April 25 (or 27), 1228: died at Lavello, Italy, May 21, 1254. King of Germany, second son of Frederick II. whom he succeeded in 1250. He defeated in 1251 the anti-king, Count William of Holland, put forward by the Pope and the Guelphs; and in the same year undertook an expedition into Italy to enforce his right of succession to the crown of Sicily, on which he died, it is said, of poison before he could firmly secure the fruit of his victories.

It is the chief commercial center of the Levant, and since 1856 has had railroad connection with the rest of Europe. It contains the sultan's palace (seraglio), and is noted for its mosques (see below). Its chief sections are Pera, Galata, Stambul, and Scutari (the latter situated in history for its military hospitals during the Crimean war). The city was founded by Constantine the Great in 330 A. D. (to its previous history, see Byzantium), became the capital of the Eastern Empire after 395, was unsuccessfully besieged by the Arabs especially in 718, and was taken by the Latins in 1204 and by Michael Palæologus in 1261, and by the Turks May 29, 1453. Tekfour-Serai, the chief of the imperial palaces, finished in 1867, by Abdul-Aziz in the style of the new Turkish Renaissance. It is a building of great size, of marble, of a luxury and richness of detail in color decoration and arrangement which are unexcelled in Europe and almost surpassed here. Its chief façade, about 1,500 feet long, is surmounted by a tower. The dominion of the Old Rome had come of itself; its dominion was the effect, and no way the cause, but of the silent working of historical causes. The first chief who fenced in the Palatine with a wall did not dream that his half-fortress would become the head of the world, or did not dream that it would become the head of Italy, or even the head of Latium. But the prince who fenced in the New Rome, the prince who built the palace in which Constantine, did design that his younger Rome should fulfil the mission that had passed away from the elder Rome. He designed that it should fulfil it more thoroughly than Milan, or Trier, or Nikomedeia could fulfil it. And his will has been carried out. He called into being a city which, while other cities have risen and fallen, has for fifteen hundred years, in whatever hands, remained the seat of Imperial rule: a city which, as long as Europe and Asia, as long as land and sea keep their places, must remain the seat of Imperial rule. The two great capitals of Europe seem by her side things of yesterday, creations of accident. Some chance a few centuries back made them seats of government till some other chance may cause to make them seats of government. But the city of Constantine abides, and must abide. Over and over again has the possession of that city prolonged the duration of powers which must otherwise have crumbled away. In the hands of Roman-

Frank, Greek, and Turk, her Imperial mission has never left her. The eternity of the elder Rome is the eternity of a moral influence; the eternity of the younger Rome is the eternity of a city and fortress fixed on a spot which nature itself had destined to be the seat of the empire of two worlds. Freeman, Hist. Essays, III. 251.

Constantinople, Conference of. A conference of the six great powers and Turkey for the purpose of preventing war between Turkey and Russia, which was championing the cause of the Christian insurgents in the Balkan Peninsula. The conference was formally opened Dec. 23, 1876, after a preliminary conference between the great powers (Dec. 11-23). The powers demanded of the Porte autonomy (administrative) for Christian provinces in Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Bulgaria; and proposed the erection of an international commission with power to enforce by arms the decisions of the conference. These demands were rejected by the Turks Jan. 20, 1877, whereupon the conference dissolved.

Emperor of Rome, father of Constantine the Great. March 1, 292, the joint emperors, or Augusti, Diocletian and Maximian associated with themselves Constantius Chlorus and Galerius as junior partners under the title of Cæsars. Gaul, Spain, and Britain were allotted to the latter. He was married to the repudiate his wife Helena and marry Theodora, the daughter of Maximian. After the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian in 305, he ruled Italy, Africa, and Illyricum with Galerius until his death in Britain while on an expedition against the Picts.

Constantius II., Flavius Julius. Born at Sirmium, Pannonia, Aug. 6, 317: died at Mopsucrene, Cilicia, Nov. 3, 361. Roman emperor, third son of Constantine the Great. He received on his second wife Fausta). The will of Constantine the Great divided the empire among his three sons Constantine, Constantius, and Constans under the title of Augusti, and his nephews Dalmatius and Hannibalianus under the titles of Cæsar and Nobilissimus, respectively. On the death of Constantine in 337 Constantius ordered, or permitted, the murder of Dalmatius and Hannibalianus, and then the empire was divided between himself and his brothers. Constantine received Gaul, Spain, Britain, and part of Africa; Constantius Thrace, Macedonia, Greece, the Asiatic provinces, and Egypt; and Constans Italy, Illyricum, and the rest of Africa. In 340 Constans successfully resisted an invasion of Constantine, who fell in battle, and made himself master of the West; but was himself deposed and slain in 350 by the usurper Magnentius. Constantius made war in 351 on the latter, whom he defeated at Mursa, on the Drave, in 351, and in 353 at Sirmium, after which he was master of the whole empire. He appointed his cousin Julian Cæsar and commander in Gaul 355, and visited Rome 357. He favored the Arians, and banished the orthodox bishops. He died while marching to attack Julian, who had been proclaimed emperor by his soldiers.

Constitution (kon-sti-tū'shon) (Old Ironsides). An American frigate of 1,576 tons and 44 guns rating (actual armament 32 long 24-pounders and 20 32-pounder carronades), built at Boston in 1797. The United States and President were sister ships of the same rating. Her first commander was Captain Isaac Hull. At the declaration of war, June 18, 1812, the Constitution was at Annapolis. July 17 she fell in with a squadron composed of Shannon (38 guns), Africa (64), Æolus (32), Belvidera (36), and Guerriere (38), commanded by Commodore Philip Vere Broke. Her escape from this fleet, in a chase which lasted three days in an almost dead calm, is considered one of the greatest feats of seamanship of the war. Aug. 19, 1812 (at lat. 41° 41' N., long. 55° 48' W.), she fought the Guerriere. The battle lasted from 5 to 7 P. M., when the Guerriere surrendered and was burned. The Constitution returned to Boston. Captain Hull resigned, and was succeeded by Captain Bainbridge of the Constellation. She sailed from Boston Oct. 26, 1812, and Dec. 29 fell in with the frigate Java (38 guns), Captain Lambert, off the coast of Brazil in lat. 13° 6' S., long. 33° W. The battle lasted from 2 to 5 P. M., when the Java surrendered. Feb. 20, 1814, she fought and captured the Cyane and Levant (20 and 18 guns). Sept. 1815 it was proposed by the secretary of the navy to dismantle the ship and sell her. This excited much public indignation, which found expression in the poem "Old Ironsides," by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Sept. 16, 1830. She was afterward used as a school-ship at Philadelphia.

Cordelia (kôr-dē'lia). [F. Cordélie.] The youngest daughter of King Lear in Shakspere's tragedy of that name. She offends him by the lack of violence in her protestations of love for him and he disinherits her. When, however, he is illtreated, maltreated, and insulted by his elder daughters, by whom he had given everything, she comes with an army to dethrone them, but is taken captive, and is killed in prison. Lear in a last outburst kills the slave who hung her, and dies upon her body.

Cordes (kord). A small town in the department of Tarn, France, 15 miles northwest of Albi. It has interesting medieval ramparts and buildings.

Cordière (kor-dyär'), La Belle. [F., 'The Beautiful Rope-maker.'] A surname of Louise Labé (see Labé), wife of one Perrin, a rope-maker.

Cordilleras (kôr-dil-yä'räs). [Sp. Cordillera, a chain or ridge of mountains, formerly also a long, straight, elevated tract of land.] A name applied to various portions of the central mountain systems of America, as the Cordilleras of Mexico, of Central America, of the United States (Rocky Mountains), and of South America (Andes). It was first given to the ranges of the Andes (the Cordilleras de los Andes," the chains of the Andes), then to the continuation of these ranges into Mexico and further north. For convenience, it is now agreed among geographers to call the complex of ranges enhraced between and including the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada, and their extension north into British Columbia, the Cordillera; those ranges occupying a similar continental position in South America are called simply the Andes. The entire western mountain-belt of the continent of North America is called the Cordilleran region. In its broadest part it has a development of a thousand miles east and west, and embraces, besides the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada, ranges between, mountain-chains, some of which are little, if at all, inferior to such chains as the Pyrenees in length and elevation.

> In course of time it became apparent that the two "grand mountain-chains" which according to geographers are the great feature of the country, do not exist. The axis of the Andes of Ecuador, part of the backbone of South America, runs nearly north and south, and cannot be the western chain of the main chain, there are a sequence of peaks more or less in a line with each other. On the east of these summits there is a succession of basins, of which Quito is one, and of ranges and peaks, and the nearest mountains on the eastern side occur at irregular distances. There is no such thing as one great valley in the interior of Ecuador. The mountains Pasochoa and Ruminahui are the only two which like parallel to the others on the western side. The main chain of the Andes was created by upheaval at some remote date, but the upheaval when this movement occurred, or whether it was an affair of a year or was spread over thousands of years. All of the Great Andes of the Equator rise out of, or upon and above, the main chain.

Cordoba (kor'dō-bä). 1. A province in the Argentine Confederation, situated about lat. 29° 30′–34° S., long. 62°–66° W. Area, 54,000 square miles. Population, 380,000.—2. The capital of the above province, situated on the Primero in lat. 31° 24′ S., long. 64° 13′ 26″ W. (observatory). It is an important commercial center, and the seat of a university and national observatory. Population (1887), 35,751.

3. A town in the state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, 55 miles west of Vera Cruz. Population, 6,000.

Cordoba, or Cordova, Francisco Hernandez (or Fernandez) de, Date of birth unknown: died at Santo Espiritu, Cuba, May or June, 1517. A Spanish soldier and explorer. He went to Cuba with Velasquez in 1511, acquired wealth there, and in Feb., 1517, commanded an expedition of 3 vessels with 110 men, fitted out as a private speculation, sailing westward, he discovered Yucatan, followed the coast around to beyond Campeche, and noticed many signs of a higher civilization than had before been found in America. At Champoton Cordoba was severely wounded in a fight with the Indians. He crossed over to Florida, thence returned to Cuba, and died of his wounds shortly after.

Cordova (kor'dō-vä), officially Córdoba (kor'dō-bä). [F. Cordoue.] 1. The capital of the province of Cordova, Spain, situated on the Guadalquivir in lat. 37°-52′ N., long. 4° 50′ W.; the Punic Karta-tuba, and the Roman Corduba or Patricia. It is famous for its manufactures of leather and of silverware. It contains many Moorish antiquities, and is celebrated for its cathedral. (See below.) It was rebuilt after its partial destruction by Cæsar, and colonized. It was the birthplace of Seneca, Lucan, and Averroes, and from 756 to 1031 was the capital of the western caliphate. It was the most famous center of learning and literature in western Europe in the middle ages, and had about 1,000,000 inhabitants. It was taken by Ferdinand III. of Castile in 1236 and was stormed by the French under Dupont in 1808. The cathedral, the old mosque of Abder-Rahman I., was begun in the 8th century, and finished in 1000. In plan it is nearly square, with 18 ranges of columns, many of them antique, supporting low horseshoe-arcades, above which a second tier of arches carries the wooden flat roofing. The original Moorish mihrab and its successor remain, and present wonderful examples of decoration in sculpture and mosaic. In the middle of the mosque a Gothic Renaissance choir was built in 1526, but the interpolation is lost in the vastness of the structure. There are many admirable Moorish doors, and other features, all together making this remarkable building one of the most existing specimens of Mohammedan architecture. The beautiful Court of Oranges, on the north, forms the cloister of the cathedral. Population (1887), 59,043.

2. A province in Andalusia, Spain. Area, 5,190 square miles. Population (1887), 420,714.—3. See Cordoba.

Cordova, Diego Fernandez de. See Fernandez de Cordova.

Cordova, Francisco Hernandez de. Born about 1475; died at Leon, Nicaragua, March, 1526. A Spanish soldier, colonist, and explorer. In 1514 he went to the Isthmus of Panama with Pedrarias, and in 1524 was sent by him to take possession of Nicaragua in defiance of the rights of the discoverer, Gil Gonzalez de Avila. Cordova founded the town of Leon, explored the lake, and found its outlet. He sent his lieutenant, Hernando de Soto, against Gil Gonzalez in Honduras; but on the arrival of Pedrarias in Honduras sought to transfer his allegiance to him, and subsequently tried to set up an independent government. Pedrarias, hearing of the defection, came to Nicaragua, seized Cordova, and had him beheaded.

Cordova, Gonsalvo Hernandez de. Born at Montilla, near Cordova, Spain, March 16, 1443; died at Granada, Spain, Dec. 2, 1515. A celebrated Spanish general, surnamed "The Great Captain." He served with distinction in the war against Portugal and the Moors. In 1492 conducted the negotiations which resulted in the union of Granada with Castile. In 1495 he expelled the French from Naples, for which service he was created duke of Sant'Angelo by Ferdinand II. He commanded Ostia for the Pope in 1496, and 1502–03 defended Barletta against the French, whom he defeated at Cerignola and on the Garigliano in 1503.

Cordova, Jorge. Born at La Paz, 1822; died there, Oct. 25, 1884. A Peruvian soldier and statesman. He was an ignorant soldier who acquired some importance by his marriage with the daughter of President Belzu. The revolutionists who drove out Belzu in 1855 proclaimed Cordova in his place, and he held the position until 18–8, when he was deposed by another outbreak. His rule was humane, but he showed little energy. He was shot during the disorders of 1884.

Cordova, Pedro de. Born in 1483: died at Santo Domingo, June 28, 1525. A Spanish Dominican, vicar of the first colony of his order in Hispaniola in 1510. He and his companions preached against Indian slavery in 1511, and in 1512 Cordova went to Spain to meet the monarch and secure the passing of new laws with relation to the services of the Indians. In 1513 he sent a missionary colony to the coast of Venezuela, and when the missionaries were killed in 1515, Cordova went himself to establish another colony. He was a friend of Las Casas.

Cordova y Figueroa (kor'dō-vä e fē-gā-rō'ä), Pedro de. Born at Concepcion, 1692; died there, probably after 1770. A Chilian historian. He was a soldier, served in Araucania, and was governor of Concepcion about 1740. His "Historia de Chile" includes the conquest and settlement to 1717, and was the most complete history of the country up to its date. The manuscript was preserved at Madrid, and it was first published from a copy in the "Coleccion de Historiadores de Chile."

Corea. See Korea.

Coreal (kō-rä-āl'), Francisco. The name appended to the "Voyage aux Indes Occidentales," published in Paris 1727. The author claimed to have been born in Cartagena in 1648, and to have traveled over nearly all of Spanish and Portuguese America. The work is generally believed to be fictitious.

Coree (kō'rē). A tribe of North American Indians formerly occupying the peninsula south of the Neuse River, North Carolina. The name probably means 'they are separate.' They joined in the outbreak of 1711, and the survivors were settled in Hyde County, North Carolina, until they became extinct. Also called Corvaane. See Iroquoian.

Corentyn (kō-ren-tin'). [Corantijn of the Dutch colonists.] A river of South America which separates British and Dutch Guiana. It flows into the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 6° N., long. 57° W. Length, 400 miles; navigable 150 miles.

Corfe Castle (kôrf kas'l). A castle in Dorset, England, 18 miles east of Dorchester. It was the scene of the murder of Edward the Martyr in 978.

Corfinium (kôr-fin'i-um). In ancient geography, a town in central Italy, near the modern Sulmona. It was the capital of the Peligni, and of the confederates in the Social War 90 B. C.

Corflambo (kôr-flam'bō). A giant, a type of unregulated love, in Spenser's "Faerie Queene," iv. 8.

Corfu (kor-fö'). 1. A nomarchy of Greece, comprising Corfu, Santa Maura, Paxo, etc. Area, 931 square miles. Population (1889), 114,535.—2. The northernmost and largest of the Ionian Islands, situated west of Albania: the ancient Coreyra or Kerkyra. Its surface is mountainous, and its principal exports are olives and wine. Length, 40 miles. Greatest breadth, 20 miles.

3. A seaport, capital of Corfu, on the eastern coast in lat. 39° 37′ N., long. 19° 56′ E.: the ancient Coreyra or Kerkyra. It has steam communication with Mediterranean ports. Corfu was colonized by Corinth in 734 B. C., and defeated Corinth, in the first recorded naval battle, in 665 B. C.; was an ally of Athens in the Peloponnesian war; was conquered by Rome in 229 B. C., and came under Venetian rule in 1386. The island formed part of the Ionian Republic from 1815 to 1864. The town was defended by the Venetians against the Turks in 1716. Population (1880), commune, 28,372.

Cori (kō'ri). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, situated 30 miles southeast of Rome: the ancient Velitræ. It contains many Roman antiquities, including Corinthian columns, fragments of walls, and a temple of Hercules, so called, a Roman-Doric structure of the time of Sulla, of unusual grace and artistic feeling. The entire temple (save pedestals) of 4 by 6 columns remains, with its entablature and low pediment. The shafts, with 20 flutes, have a height of 7 diameters without base or capital; triglyphs occupy the angles of the frieze, in Greek fashion. The doorway of the cella is richly framed and ornamented.

Corin (kō'rin). 1. See Corineus.—2. A shepherd in Shakspere's comedy "As you Like it."

Corinaeus. See Gigantomachy.

Corinium (kō-rin'i-um). An important town in ancient Britain: the modern Cirencester.

Corinna (kō-rin'ä). [Gr. Κόριννα.] Born at Tanagra, Bœotia, Greece: lived in the first part of the 5th century B. C. A Greek lyric poet, sometimes called a Theban from her long residence in Thebes. She was a contemporary and instructor of Pindar, from whom she is said to have won the prize five times at the public games. A few fragments of her poems have been preserved. There were three of the name of Corinna, all skilled in letters. One was of Thebes, one of Thespiæ, and the third of Corinth. The last lived at the time, and is supposed to have been the favourite, of Ovid; but the most famous else who.

In a trial of poetry, conquered the great poet Pindar. Her glory seems to have been fully established by the public memorial of her picture exhibited in her native city, and adorned with a symbol of her victory. Tanagrians, who saw it, supposes her to have been one of the handsomest women of her age. . . . Time has left us only a few scraps of Corinna's poetry." Smith's Epitome, lib. xx., note.

Corinna. In Vanbrugh's comedy "The Confederacy," the daredevil daughter of Gripe.

Corinna. A name given by Dryden to Mrs. Thomas with whom he had a correspondence. She fell into distress and became one of Curll's authors, furnishing him with a fictitious account of Dryden's funeral.

Corinne ou l'Italie (kō-ren' ö lē-tä-lē'). [F., 'Corinne or Italy.'] A novel by Madame de Staël, published in 1807: named from its heroine.

Corinth (kor'inth). [Gr. Κόρινθος, L. Corinthus.] A city of Greece, situated near the Isthmus and Gulf of Corinth in lat. 37° 54′ N., long. 22° 52′ E.: the modern Gortho. It was originally called Ephyre (Ἐφύρη), and was noted in ancient times as a center of commerce, literature, and art. It was founded about 1350 B. C.; was conquered by the Dorians in the 11th century; colonized Coreyra and Syracuse in 734; prospered under the tyrant Periander about 600; sided with Sparta in the Peloponnesian war against Athens, and later (395–387) engaged in the "Corinthian war" against Sparta: was defeated by Sparta in 394; was held by the Macedonians until 243, when it joined the Achæan League, of which it was the capital; was captured, sacked, and burned by the Romans under Mummius, in 146; and was rebuilt by Julius Cæsar in 46 B. C. In recent times it has been taken and retaken by Turks and Venetians, was destroyed by an earthquake in 1858, and was rebuilt on a site 3 miles distant (New Corinth). Population (1889), commune, 11,150

Corinth. A village in northeastern Mississippi, 90 miles east by south of Memphis. It was an important strategic point in the Civil War, and was besieged by the Federals under Halleck May, 1862, and evacuated by the Confederates under Beauregard May 29. Here, Oct. 3, 4, the Federals (over 20,000) under Rosecrans defeated the Confederates (28,000) under Van Dorn and Price. Reported loss of the Federals, 2,520; of the Confederates, 4,38-.

Corinth, Gulf of. See Lepanto, Gulf of.

Corinth, Isthmus of. An isthmus which separates the Gulf of Lepanto from the Gulf of Ægina, and connects the Morea with central Greece. Width, 4–8 miles.

Corinthia (kō-rin'thi-ä). In ancient geography, a division of Greece, lying between the Gulf of Corinth on the north, Megaris on the northeast, the Saronic Gulf on the east, Argolis on the south, and Argolis and Sicyonia on the west.

Corinthians (kō-rin'thi-anz), First and Second Epistles to the. Epistles of Paul, of which the first was composed at Ephesus in the spring of 57, and the second at some place in Macedonia in the summer or autumn of the same year.

Coriolanus (kō'ri-ō-lā'nus), the surname of Cnæus (less correctly Caius) Marcius. Lived in the first half of the 5th century B. C. A Roman legendary hero, represented as the champion of the patricians, and afterward as leader of the Volscians against Rome. He was the conqueror of the Volscian Corioli (whence his surname).

Coriolanus. 1. A tragedy by Shakspere, produced probably in 1608, and founded on North's "Plutarch." In the play the mother of Caius (Cnæus) Marcius Coriolanus is Volumnia, not Veturia, and his wife is Virgilia, not Volumnia as in the original. John Dennis produced a play in 1705 founded on "Coriolanus," which he called "The Invader of his Country, or the Fatal Resentment."

2. A tragedy by James Thomson, left in manuscript by him, brought upon the stage by Sir George Littleton. It was published in 1748 or 1749.

Corioli (kō-ri'ō-li). In ancient geography, a city of Latium, Italy. It gave name to Coriolanus, by whom it was conquered 493 (?) B. C. Its exact site is unknown, but is probably at Monte-Giove, near Ariccia.

Corisca. In Guarini's "Pastor Fido," a woman ruined by town life, contrasted with the Arcadian maidens.

Coritani (kō-ri-tā'vi), or Coritani (kō-ri-tā'ni). An ancient British tribe which occupied territory that included the modern Lincoln and Leicester.

> Strabo also, speaking of the Coritavi, a British tribe in Lincolnshire, after mentioning their yellow hair, says, "to show how tall they are, I saw myself some of their young men at Rome, and they were taller by six inches than any one else in the city." I. Taylor, Aryans, p. 76.

Cork (kôrk). 1. The southernmost county of Munster, Ireland. It lies between Limerick on the north, Tipperary on the northeast, Waterford on the east, the Atlantic Ocean on the south, and Kerry on the west. It is the largest county of Ireland, having an area of 2,890 square miles. Population (1891), 438,432.

2. A city, capital of the above county, situated on the Lee, near its mouth, in lat. 51° 54′ N., long. 8° 28′ W. Its lower part is queenstown. It is the third city in Ireland, exports butter, live stock, provisions, leather, etc., and is the seat of Queen's College. It was founded about 600; was fortified by the Danes; was surrendered by its king to Henry II. in 1172; and was besieged and taken by Cromwell in 1649, and by Marlborough in 1690. Population (1891), 75,345.

Cork, Earls of. See Boyle.

Corleone (kor-le-ō'ne). A town in the province of Palermo, Sicily, 21 miles south of Palermo. Population, 15,000.

Corliss (kôr'lis), George Henry. Born at Easton, N. Y., July 2, 1817: died at Providence, R. I., Feb. 21, 1888. An American inventor and manufacturer, noted as a designer of steam-engines. He first patented improvements in engines in 1849.

Cormac (kôr'mak). Born 836: died 908. A king of Cashel, Ireland, who reigned 900–908. He perished in a battle on the site of the present Ballymoon, in the latter year. A glossary of Irish words called "Sanas Chormaic," the most venerable monument of the literature of Munster and the earliest Irish dictionary," is attributed to him.

> The oldest extant fragment of the glossary is in the "Book of Leinster," a manuscript of about A. D. 1200, and the oldest complete manuscript (Royal Irish Academy, H. and S. No. 224, s. 3167) is of the 15th century. Some Irish writers state that the glossary was part of a large work known as "Saltair Chaisil." This has been generally attributed to Cormac, but there are no safe grounds for believing it to be his, or indeed for regarding it as anything but an ancient collection of transcripts such as the existing "Lebor na Huidri." The "Sanas Chormaic" was first printed by Whitley Stokes in 1862.

Cornaro (kor-nä'rō), Caterina. Born at Venice, 1454: died at Venice, July 5, 1510. Queen of Cyprus. She married in 1472 James of Lusignan, king of Cyprus, on whose death in 1473 she succeeded to the throne. She abdicated in favor of the Republic of Venice in 1488.

Cornaro, Caterina, at Venice. A sumptuous painting by Hans Makart, in the National Gallery at Berlin. The Queen of Cyprus, enthroned, receives the homage of Venetian patricians. There is evident aim to reproduce Titian's grouping and splendor of color.

Cornbury, Viscount. See Hyde.

Corneille (kor-nāy'), Pierre. Born at Rouen, June 6, 1606: died at Paris, Oct. 1, 1684. A celebrated French dramatist. He was graduated with high honors from the Jesuit College of his native city, studied law, and was admitted to the bar June 18, 1624. His first comedy, "Mélite," was intrusted to a comedian who put it on the stage between 1628 and 1630, and scored a marked success. Corneille immediately wrote a second play, "Clitandre," this time a tragicomedy of most extravagant and absurd nature, produced about 1631 or 1632. Thereupon he made a return to pure comedy with "La veuve" (1633), "La galerie du palais" (1635), "La suivante" (1634), "La place royale" (1634), and "L'Illusion comique" (1636). This series was interrupted by the tragedy "Médée" (1635), barring which Corneille passed at once from simple comedy to sublime tragedy. "Le Cid," appearing toward the close of 1636 or the beginning of 1637, marks a new era in the history of the French stage. This masterpiece failed, nevertheless, to secure universal recognition, and was the cause of the famous "querelle du Cid" raised by the French Academy. The year 1640 witnessed the production of two new tragedies, "Horace" and "Cinna." Subsequently, frequently looked upon as Corneille's greatest work, was produced in 1642. "La mort de Pompée" and Corneille's finest comedy, "Le menteur," appeared in 1643, "Polyeucte" and "La suite du menteur" in 1645, and "Rodogune" in 1646. Corneille issued "Héraclius" in 1647, "Andromède" and "Don Sanche d'Aragon" in 1650, "Nicomède" in 1651, and "Pertharite" in 1653. This last play was not a success, and Corneille ceased to write for the stage for six or seven years, concentrating his energies on rendering "L'Imitation de Jésus-Christ" (1651–56). About 1662 he was induced to return to the old work, and brought out "Œdipe," "La toison d'or," and "Sertorius" (1662), "Sophonisbe" (1663), and "Othon" (1664). His work during the latter part of his life deserve mention simply for the name of their author: they are "Agésilas" (1666), "Attila" (1667), "Tite et Bérénice" (1670), "Pulchérie" (1672), and "Suréna" (1674). Corneille ranks with Descartes as the first to free the French language and thought from the restrictions due to Greek and Latin influences.

Corneille, Thomas. Born at Rouen, Aug. 20, 1625: died at Les Andelys, Dec. 8, 1709. A French dramatist and miscellaneous writer, younger brother of Pierre Corneille. His plays (which number over 40) include "Ariane" (1672), "Le festin de Pierre" (1677), "Le comte d'Essex" (1678), etc.

Cornelia gens (kōr-nē'li-ä jenz). A celebrated patrician and plebeian clan or house in ancient Rome. The patrician family names previous to the empire were Arvina, Blasio, Cethegus, Cinna, Cossus, Dolabella, Lentulus, Maluginensis, Mammula, Merenda, Meruln, Rufinus, Scapula, Scipio, Sicenna, and Sulla. The plebeian family names were Balbus and Gallus.

Cornelian Laws, L. Leges Corneliæ (lē'jēz kōr-nē'li-ē). The body of laws introduced at Rome by the dictator L. Cornelius Sulla about 82 B. C., with a view to restoring the aristocratic form of government, whose integrity had been destroyed by the democratic legislation of the Gracchi and of Marius.

Cornelius (kōr-nē'lius). [L., It. Sp. Pg. Cornelio, F. Cornelius, G. Cornelius.] A Roman centurion, stationed at Cæsarea, whom Peter, in consequence of a special revelation, received into the communion of the Christian church directly by baptism, without circumcision (Acts x.).

Cornelius. Born at Rome: elected pope in March, 251, to succeed Fabianus. The Novatians having refused to recognize his election, and having chosen their leader Novatianus in his stead, Cornelius convened a council at Rome in 251, which confirmed his election. He was banished by the emperor Gallus to Civitá Vecchia, where, according to some (late) accounts, he suffered martyrdom.

Cornelius. 1. A courtier in Shakspere's tragedy "Hamlet."—2. A physician in Shakspere's play "Cymbeline."—3. The friend of Faustus in Marlowe's play "Dr. Faustus."

Cornelius (kor-nā'lē-ŭs). Karl Adolf. Born at Würzburg, Bavaria, March 12, 1819. A German historian. He became professor of history in the University of Bonn in 1854, and in the University of Munich in 1868. His works include "Geschichte des münsterischen Aufruhrs" (1855–60), "Kurfurst Moritz von Sachsen," "Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur Geschichte der Reformation" (1870), etc.

Cornelius Nepos. See Nepos.

Cornelius, Peter von. Born at Düsseldorf, Prussia, Sept. 23, 1783: died at Berlin, March 6, 1867. A German painter, leader of the new school of German art. He worked in Rome 1811–19, and in the latter year took charge of the academy at Dusseldorf. In 1841 he labored chiefly at Munich, and after 1841 at Berlin. His chief works are frescos in the Glyptothek and Ludwigskirche in Munich, and cartoons for the Campo Santo in Berlin.

Cornell (kôr-nel'), Ezra. Born at Westchester Landing, N. Y., Jan. 11, 1807: died at Ithaca, N. Y., Dec. 9, 1874. An American philanthropist. He followed the occupation of mechanic and miller at Ithaca, N. Y., 1828–41, and subsequently amassed a fortune, chiefly as contractor for the erection of telegraph lines. He was a member of the State Assembly in 1862 and 1865, and was a member of the State Senate 1864–67. He is chiefly known as the founder of Cornell University (which see).

Cornell University. An institution of learning situated at Ithaca, N. Y. Its curriculum comprises courses in arts, literature, philosophy, science, agriculture, civil and mechanical engineering, history, political science, etc., and extended graduate courses. It was founded by Ezra Cornell (see above), and was opened in 1868. Its library contains about 140,000 volumes.

Cornelys (kor-na'lis), Theresa. Born at Venice in 1725: died in the Fleet Prison, Aug. 19, 1797. A noted manager of public assemblies in Carlisle House, London. At one time she had the direction of all the theaters in the Austrian Netherlands. Besides the management of balls, concerts, and masquerades, she also sang. She fell into obscurity after a notorious life, and under the name of Mrs. Smith sold ass's milk at Knightsbridge for some time before her death. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Corneto (kor-nā'tō), or Corneto-Tarquinia. A town in the province of Rome, Italy, 44 miles northwest of Rome. It contains a castle, palace, and many Etruscan and Roman antiquities. Remarkable Etruscan tombs and the site of the old city of Tarquinii are in the vicinity. It is the seat of a bishop. Population, 4,000.

Corn-Law Rhymer. Ebenezer Elliott, author of "Corn-Law Rhymes."

Corn-Laws, The. In English history, a series of laws, extending from 1436 to 1842, regulating the home and foreign grain-trade of England. Until the repeal of the corn laws, the grain-trade, both export and import, was the subject of elaborate and varying legislation, which consisted in levying protective or prohibitory duties, or in imposing restrictive conditions, or in granting government bounties for the encouragement of exportation. After a prolonged agitation for the repeal of the corn-laws by the Anti-Corn-Law League (organized in 1839), Parliament in 1846, under the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, passed an act for a large immediate reduction of the duty on imported grain, and providing for a merely nominal duty after 1849, which was subsequently entirely removed.

Corno, Monte. See Monte Corno.

Cornwallis, Charles. Born at London, Dec. 31, 1738: died at Ghazipur, British India, Oct. 5, 1805. An English soldier and statesman, the second Earl Cornwallis, created Marquis Cornwallis Aug. 15, 1792. He entered the army in 1756, served in the battles of Minden, Vellinghausen, Wilhelmstadt, and others (1758–62); was elected member of Parliament in Jan., 1760, and entered the House of Lords in June, 1762, when he succeeded to the title; and was chief justice in eye south of the Trent 1766–69. In 1775 he was promoted major-general, and in Feb., 1776, was sent with seven regiments to reinforce the English troops in America. He joined Sir William Howe at Halifax, and served under him in the campaign on Long Island and about New York. In Sept., 1777, he gained the battle of Brandywine and occupied Philadelphia, and in April, 1778, was promoted lieutenant-general and appointed second in command to Sir Henry Clinton, then commander-in-chief in America. At Monmouth, Aug. 28, he defended the rear-guard, and in the battle of Guilford Court House March 15, 1781; and surrendered to Washington at Yorktown Oct. 19, 1781. He was appointed governor-general of India and commander-in-chief in 1786; waged successful war with Tippu Sahib 1790–92, and resigned his offices in 1793 and returned to England. In 1795 he was appointed master-general of the ordnance with a seat in the cabinet, and was viceroy and commander-in-chief of Ireland from May, 1798, till his resignation, Feb., 1801, suppressing the rebellion of the same year. He was sent to France to negotiate the peace in 1802, and in 1805 he again went to India as governor-general and commander-in-chief.

Coroados (kō-rō-ā'dōs). The name given to several different Indian hordes in Brazil. (a) A wandering tribe in western São Paulo, Paraná, and Rio Grande do Sul. They were formerly numerous and powerful, but are now reduced to a few thousands. Until very recently they have kept up a predatory war with the whites. The name in this case is Portuguese, meaning "tonsured," and refers to their custom of removing the hair from the top of the head, leaving a ring around the crown. (b) A tribe of Matto Grosso, living mainly on the Upper São Lourenço River. They are probably the remains of the powerful tribe known as Guaycurus in the 16th century. Azara's name has long been corrupted to its present form. These Indians, now reduced to a few hundreds, have fixed villages and practise agriculture. They have frequently ravaged the settlements of Matto Grosso, but in 1887 made peace with the whites. (c) A horde on the Paraguay River, allied to the Payas.

Coromandel Coast (kor-ō-man'del kōst). A name applied to that part of the eastern seaboard of the Indian peninsula which lies between Calimere Point (lat. 10° 17′ N.) and the mouths of the Krishna (15° 45′ N.).

Corombona (kō-rom-bō'nä). Vittoria. The "white devil" in Webster's tragedy of that name. Having fascinated the Duke of Bracchiano, she renounces everything for pleasure. At her instigation he procures the deaths of her husband and the duchess. She is brought before the Tribunal and arraigned for these murders, but her guilt is not proved, and she retires to a house of Convertites from which Bracchiano secretly takes her and marries her. He is shortly poisoned by the emissaries of the Great Duke, and she is stabbed by her brother Flamineo in revenge for Bracchiano's failure to advance him, he having married his sister to her contrary to conduct to that end. The latter scene is one of great power. "Step by step, like a soldier brought to bay with his back against a wall, she defends herself, parrying and defying adversaries and hangers-on, probably not blenching or quailing, clear in mind, ready to word stand insults and proofs, even menaced with death on the scaffold." Taine, English Literature, I. 286.

Coronado, Francisco Vasquez de. Born at Salamanca about 1[illegible]: died in Mexico after 1542. A Spanish soldier. Probably he went to Mexico in 1535 with the viceroy Mendoza, who in 1539 appointed him governor of Nueva Galicia. In 1540 he headed an expedition to the north in search of Cibola and the Seven Cities, penetrating to what is now New Mexico, and perhaps to Kansas. He returned with only a remnant of his force.

Coronado, Juan Vasquez de. Born at Salamanca about 1525: drowned at sea, Oct., 1565. A Spanish administrator. He went to Guatemala in 1550; was made alcalde mayor of San Salvador and Honduras and, later, of Nicaragua, and in 1562 was appointed to the same office in Costa Rica. He explored the whole country, and founded Cartago in 1563. In 1564 he went to Spain, where, in recognition of his work, he was named hereditary captain-general of Costa Rica. He was shipwrecked and drowned while returning.

Coronation (kor-ō-nā'shon), The. A play, licensed 1635 as by Shirley, and claimed by him as his own in a list of his plays published by him in 1652. On the title-page of its first edition, printed 1640, it was attributed to Fletcher, and is included in the earlier editions of Beaumont and Fletcher's works. (Ward.) There is no reason for supposing that Fletcher had any hand in it. Bullen.

A college of Oxford University, founded in 1516 by Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester. Its statutes were issued in 1517.

Corpus Christi Day. A festival of the Roman Church in honor of the Consecrated Host, founded by Pope Urban IV. in 1264. It is held on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday. It is still in the English calendar. Religious plays were formerly performed in the streets by crafts or trade companies on Corpus Christi Day in England and also on the Continent. Lope de Vega raised them to a high level in Spain. A Corpus Christi gild was founded in 1408 in York to celebrate the day with a procession, but this had nothing to do with the performance of the plays. See Coventry Plays and York Plays.

Corpus Juris (kôr'pus jō'ris). [L., 'the body of the law.'] See the extract.

In the East Justinian created the so-called corpus juris. This consists of two principal parts, the law of the Jurists (ius vetus) and the Imperial law (ius principale), the latter of which was first executed (a. 529–34; revised and remodelled version, 534). A commission was appointed for this purpose, the chief member being Tribonianus (546). The constitutions of the Emperors were again sifted from the extant collections and from the additions thereto abridged and united in the twelve books of the Codex Justinianus. These extracts from the ius vetus were arranged in 50 books called Digesta, a. 528–533. On the basis of the new legislation a new manual was likewise elaborated by Tribonian, Theophilus and Dorotheus, the four books of Institutiones, chiefly after Gaius. To these collections of Justinian were added subsequent ordinances, Novellæ, in several private collections, from a. 535 to about the end of the following century, mostly in Greek. Though Justinian, in causing these collections to be made, besides the craving to immortalise his name, was governed by the autocratic idea of establishing mechanical uniformity by foreclosing all development among the lawyers and debarring the judge from the exercise of his individual opinion, still it was he who rescued the treasures of ancient jurisprudence, otherwise doomed to destruction, rendered possible an historical treatment of Roman law by his Digest, and laid the foundation of all further development of that law.

Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), II. 542.

Corral (kor-räl'), Poinciano. Born in Costa Rica about 1810; died at Granada, Nicaragua, Nov. 8, 1855. A Central American general. He defeated Castellon early in 1855, and Walker in June of that year. In October he was made minister of war; but he was detected in a correspondence with the legitimist leaders, accused by Walker, tried, and shot.
